8 agri nullum militem dare possint.[1] Fregellas quoque milia quattuor familiarum transisse ab se Samnites Paelignique querebantur, neque eo minus aut hos 9 aut illos in dilectu militum dare. Genera autem fraudis duo mutandae viritim civitatis inducta erant. Lex sociis [2] nominis Latini, qui stirpem ex sese domi relinquerent, dabat ut cives Romani fierent. Ea lege male utendo alii sociis, alii populo Romano 10 iniuriam faciebant. Nam et ne stirpem domi relinquerent, liberos suos quibusquibus Romanis in eam condicionem ut manu mitterentur mancipio dabant, libertinique cives essent; et quibus stirps [3] deesset quam relinquerent, ut cives Romani fierent, adopta-

[1] possint Madvig: possent Fr.
[2] sociis Drakenborch: sociis ac Fr.
[3] stirps Weissenborn: stirpes Fr.

---

[1] Fregellae was a Latin colony. It seems that as residents of Latium moved to Rome, so allies from other parts of Italy migrated to towns with larger privileges, without affecting the quota of troops required from their old homes.

[2] The use of pronouns is peculiar and the text may be corrupt. One would expect a complaint that the quota of Fregellae had not been raised to correspond to its increased population.

[3] The meaning is uncertain. Perhaps this ordinance was part of the original compact which governed the relations of Rome and the Latin League. From the fact that there is no reference to it in XXXIX. iii, it might be argued that the law had been passed since 189 B.C.

[4] The phrase stirpem ex sese has reference to natural, not adopted sons; the provision is an insurance against a decrease in the number of families in a community.

[5] The procedure is difficult to follow, especially in the light of the preceding sentence. This much is clear, that the father which would be unable to furnish a single soldier. B.C. 177

Similarly the Samnites and Paelignians complained that four thousand families had moved from their territories to Fregellae,[1] nor did either [2] community furnish fewer soldiers on that account when the levy was made. Moreover, two kinds of fraud had been practised to secure individual transfers of citizenship. The law [3] granted to any persons among the allies of the Latin confederacy, who should leave [4] in their home towns offspring of their loins, the privilege of becoming Roman citizens. By the abuse of this law some were injuring the allies, some the Roman people. For in the first place, in order to evade the requirement that they should leave offspring at home, they would give their sons to any Romans whatsoever in slavery, on the condition that they should be manumitted and thus become citizens of freedman condition; [5] in the second place, those who had no offspring to leave behind, in order to become Roman citizens adopted children.[6] Later, disdain-who aspired to become a Roman citizen satisfied the requirement mentioned above by leaving a son behind him; next he transferred that son collusively to some Roman by the legal process of mancipium; after the father had acquired the Roman citizenship, presumably, the Roman who had purchased the son set him free, whereby the son also became a civis, though a libertinus, by reason of his temporary slavery. This method injured the socii, by depriving them of a family.

[6] Teis passage has been emended in many ways: I have preferred the text of Voigt, mainly on account of its brevity, since the general purport of all is the same (for other suggestions see the apparatus of Giarratano). One may assume that the phrase stirpem ex sese was found legally ambiguous, and was stretched to include adoptive children. This method injured the Romans, since the law had been evaded, even if not actually violated.

A.U.C. 577

11 bant.[1] Postea his quoque imaginibus iuris spretis, promiscue sine lege, sine stirpe in civitatem Romanam
12 per migrationem et censum transibant.[2] Haec ne postea fierent petebant legati, et ut redire in civitates iuberent socios; deinde ut lege caverent ne quis quem civitatis mutandae causa suum faceret neve alienaret; et si quis ita civis Romanus factus esset, civis ne esset.[3] Haec impetrata ab senatu.

IX. Provinciae deinde, quae in bello erant, Sar-
2 dinia atque Histria consulibus[4] decretae. In Sardiniam duae legiones scribi iussae, quina milia in singulas et duceni pedites, treceni equites, et duodecim milia peditum sociorum ac Latini nominis et sescenti equites et decem quinqueremes naves, si
3 deducere ex navalibus vellet. Tantumdem peditum equitumque in Histriam, quantum in Sardiniam, decretum. Et legionem unam cum equitibus trecentis, et quinque milia peditum sociorum et ducentos quinquaginta mittere equites in Hispaniam consules
4 ad M. Titinium iussi. Priusquam consules pro-
5 vincias sortirentur, prodigia nuntiata sunt: lapidem in agro Crustumino in lucum[5] Martis de caelo cecidisse; puerum trunci corporis in agro Romano natum et quadrupedem anguem visum; et Capuae

[1] fierent, adoptabant Voigt: fiebant Fr.: lacunam indicavit Crévier, quam alii alio modo suppleverunt.
[2] transibant Curio: transiebant Fr.
[3] esset civis ne esset Doujat: esset Fr.
[4] consulibus add. Perizonius.
[5] lucum Cluver: lacum Fr.

---

[1] This clause forbids both the adoption and the mancipatory sale of a son to avoid the older law.

ing even these pretences of obedience to law, just as they pleased, with no regard to the statute or to the requirement of offspring, they would transfer to the Roman citizenship by migration and recognition in the census. In order that these things might not occur in future, the ambassadors requested first, that the senate should direct allies to return to their cities; second, that a law should be passed providing that no one should acquire a son or dispose of one for the purpose of changing his citizenship;[1] third, that if anyone should thus become a Roman citizen, he should not be a Roman citizen. These petitions were granted by the senate. B.C. 177

IX. Next the provinces which were at war, Sardinia and Histria, were decreed to the consuls. For Sardinia two legions were ordered to be raised, each of fifty-two hundred infantry and three hundred cavalry; also twelve thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry from the allies of the Latin confederacy, and ten ships of five banks of oars, in case the consul should wish to launch any from the docks. The same number of infantry and cavalry were decreed for Histria as for Sardinia. Also, the consuls were directed to send one legion with three hundred cavalry and five thousand allied infantry and two hundred and fifty cavalry[2] to Marcus Titinius[3] in Spain. Before the consuls drew lots for their provinces, the prodigies were reported: a stone fell from the sky into the grove of Mars in the territory of Crustumerium; a boy whose body was without limbs was born near Rome and a four-legged snake was seen; and at [1] I.e. of the allies, the three hundred being Roman.

[2] There were two praetors of this name: only three praetors are listed for the year 178 B.C. in XL. lix. 5.

A.U.C. 577

multa in foro aedificia de caelo tacta; et Puteolis
6 duas naves fulminis ictu concrematas esse. Inter haec quae nuntiabantur, lupus etiam Romae interdiu agitatus, cum Collina porta intrasset, per Esquilinam
7 magno consectantium tumultu evasit. Eorum prodigiorum causa consules maiores hostias immolarunt, et diem unum circa omnia pulvinaria supplicatio fuit.
8 Sacrificiis rite perfectis provincias sortiti sunt; Claudio Histria, Sempronio Sardinia obvenit.
9 Legem dein de sociis C. Claudius tulit ex [1] senatus consulto et edixit, qui socii [2] nominis Latini, ipsi maioresve eorum, M. Claudio T. Quinctio censoribus postve ea apud socios nominis Latini censi essent, ut omnes in suam quisque civitatem ante kal. Novem-
10 bres redirent. Quaestio qui ita non redissent L.
11 Mummio praetori decreta est. Ad legem et edictum [3] consulis senatus consultum adiectum est ut dictator, consul, interrex, censor, praetor, qui nunc esset quive postea futurus esset,[4] apud eorum quem qui [5] manu mitteretur, in libertatem vindicaretur, ut ius iurandum daret, qui eum manu mitteret, civi-

[1] ex add. J. F. Gronovius.
[2] socii Schmidt: socii ac Fr.
[3] a syllaba TVM incipit V.
[4] quive postea futurus esset add. Weissenborn.
[5] qui add. Crévier.

---

[1] They were censors in 189 B.C. (XXXVII. lviii. 2).
[2] In viii. 2 above Mummius was allotted Sardinia, but this province had later been transferred to Gracchus.
[3] The offices of dictator and interrex were rarely used at this period but were included for completeness, since they might be revived in future.
[4] The two clauses together constitute both the requirements for granting freedom to a slave and the methods to be followed.

Capua also many buildings in the forum were struck by lightning; and at Puteoli two ships were burned by lightning bolts. In the midst of the announcement of these occurrences, a wolf was pursued even in Rome by day, after entering by the Porta Collina, and escaped by the Porta Esquilina amid great uproar on the part of the pursuers. By reason of these portents the consuls sacrificed full-grown victims, and for one day a supplication was held at all the banquet-tables of the gods. The sacrifices having been duly completed, the consuls drew for their provinces; Histria fell to Claudius, Sardinia to Sempronius. B.C. 177

Then Gaius Claudius, with the authorization of the senate, proposed a law concerning the allies, and issued a proclamation to the effect that all allies of the Latin confederacy, in the event that they themselves or their ancestors had been registered among the allies of the Latin confederacy in the censorship of Marcus Claudius and Titus Quinctius or thereafter,[1] should all return, each to his own state, before the Kalends of November. The investigation of those who should not have returned in this fashion was decreed to Lucius Mummius the praetor.[2] To this law and proclamation of the consul a decree of the senate was added, that a dictator, consul, interrex, censor, or praetor, who was at the time in office or should henceforth be in office,[3] before any one of whom a slave was brought for manumission and for the assertion of his claim to freedom,[4] should require that an oath be given[5] that the person who was manumitting the slave was [5] The syntax is obscure, but the sense requires that the oath be given by the manumissor.

A.U.C. 577

tatis mutandae causa manu non mittere; in quo id[1] non iuraret,[2] eum manu mittendum non censuerunt. 12 Haec in posterum cauta iussique edicto C. Claudi consulis. . . [3] Mummio decreta est.

X. Dum haec Romae geruntur, M. Iunius et A. Manlius, qui priore anno consules fuerant, cum[4] Aquileiae hibernassent, principio veris[5] in finis 2 Histrorum exercitum introduxerunt; ubi cum effuse popularentur, dolor magis et indignatio diripi res suas cernentes Histros, quam certa spes, satis sibi 3 virium adversus duos exercitus esse,[6] excivit. Concursu ex omnibus populis iuventutis facto repentinus et tumultuarius exercitus acrius primo impetu quam 4 perseverantius pugnavit. Ad quattuor milia eorum in acie caesa; ceteri omisso bello in civitates passim diffugerunt. Inde legatos primum ad pacem petendam in castra Romana, deinde obsides imperatos 5 miserunt. Haec cum Romae cognita litteris proconsulum essent, C. Claudius consul veritus ne forte eae res provinciam et[7] exercitum sibi adimerent,

[1] in quo id Heerwagen: inqvid V (ex corr., ut vid.).
[2] iuraret Fr.: ivrare V.
[3] lacunam indicavit Madvig.
[4] cum Fr.: qvi V.
[5] veris Fr.: veri V.
[6] esse add. Madvig.
[7] eae res provinciam et Vahlen: ea r. p. V.

---

[1] This decree prevents the first method of evasion described in viii. 10 above.

[2] Madvig's suggestion as to the last words is followed except at the end, since he requires that the investigation be entrusted to Claudius. Because this contradicts sec. 10 above, I have modified his supplement, with no authority except the desire for a greater measure of consistency.

not manumitting him for the purpose of changing his citizenship;[1] in any case in which this oath was not taken, they decreed that the manumission should not take place. These precautions were taken for the future, and orders were issued under the edict of Gaius Claudius the consul [for the return of the allies to their states. The investigation thereof] was ordered [to be conducted under the supervision] of Mummius.[2] B.C. 177

X. While all these things were being done at Rome, Marcus Junius and Aulus Manlius, who had been consuls the preceding year, after wintering at Aquileia, in the beginning of spring led the army into the land of the Histrians; while they were plundering far and wide, grief and indignation at the sight of their ravaged possessions roused the Histrians more than any assured hope that they had strength enough to withstand the two armies. When the young men from all the communities had rushed together, the army, hastily raised for the emergency, fought at the first clash with greater vigour than perseverance. About four thousand of them were killed in the battle-line, the rest, abandoning the campaign, scattered in every direction to their states. Then they first sent ambassadors to the Roman camp to ask peace, then the hostages which were demanded. When this was known at Rome from the dispatch of the proconsuls, Gaius Claudius the consul, fearing that these occurrences might perhaps deprive him of his province and his army,[3] without [3] The senate had earlier prorogued the imperium of Junius and Manlius (vi. 2 above), and the assignment of Histria to Claudius left them without occupation; friction was bound to follow.

A.U.C. 577

non votis nuncupatis, non paludatis [1] lictoribus, uno omnium certiore facto collega, nocte profectus, praeceps in provinciam abiit; ubi inconsultius quam 6 venerat se gessit. Nam cum contione advocata fugam e castris A. Manlio adversis auribus militum, quippe qui primi ipsi fugissent, obiectasset [2] et [3] ingessisset probra M. Iunio, quod se dedecoris socium collegae fecisset, ad extremum utrumque 7 decedere provincia iussit. Ad [4] quod cum illi tum consulis imperio dicto audientes futuros esse dicerent, cum is more maiorum, secundum vota in Capitolio nuncupata, lictoribus paludatis profectus ab urbe 8 esset, furens ira vocatum, qui pro quaestore Manli erat, catenas [5] poposcit, vinctos [6] se Iunium Man- 9 liumque minitans Romam missurum. Ab eo quoque spretum consulis imperium est; et circumfusus exercitus, favens imperatorum causae et consuli infestus, 10 animos ad non [7] parendum addebat. Postremo fatigatus consul et contumeliis singulorum et multitudinis—nam insuper inridebant—ludibriis, nave 11 eadem qua venerat Aquileiam redit. Inde collegae scripsit ut militum novorum ei parti quae scripta in [1] paludatis Fr.: pabvlatis V.

[2] obiectasset Madvig: iactasset V.
[3] et add. Kreyssig.
[4] ad add. M. Mueller.
[5] catenas Fr.: catena V.
[6] vinctos Fr.: vinctosqve V.
[7] non Fr.: nos V.

announcing his vows or clothing his lictors in uniform, B.C. 177 notifying only his colleague of everything, set out by night and went off at headlong speed to his province; there his conduct was more rash than his coming. For when, calling an assembly, he had upbraided Aulus Manlius for his flight from the camp (the soldiers, who themselves had begun the flight, listening with hostile ears) and had heaped insults upon Marcus Junius, because he had made himself a partner in his colleague's disgrace, he ended by ordering both to leave the province. When they had replied to this that they would obey the command of a consul at such time as he set out from the City in the manner of their forefathers, after public proclamation of his vows on the Capitoline and with his lictors in uniform,[1] Claudius, maddened with rage, summoned the officer who was acting as quaestor for Manlius and demanded from him chains, threatening that he would send Junius and Manlius to Rome in irons. This officer also ignored the command of the consul; and the army standing round about favouring the cause of the generals and hostile to the consul, gave the quaestor courage to disobey. At last the consul, worn out by the insults of individuals and the jeers of the whole crowd—for they ridiculed him as well—returned to Aquileia in the same ship in which he had come. Thence he wrote to his colleague to issue an edict that such portion of the new troops as had been

[1] The proconsuls take the position that Claudius, having left Rome without performing the usual formalities, has no legal right to command in the province. There may have been no law to this effect, but custom was, in the main, on their side: cf., e.g. XXI. lxiii. 2.

A.U.C. 577

Histriam provinciam esset ediceret Aquileiam ut conveniret, ne quid se Romae teneret quo minus
12 votis nuncupatis paludatus ab urbe exiret. Haec a collega obsequenter facta, brevisque dies ad conveniendum edicta est. Claudius prope consecutus
13 est litteras suas. Contione adveniens de Manlio et Iunio habita, non ultra triduum moratus Romae, paludatis lictoribus votisque in Capitolio nuncupatis, in provinciam aeque ac prius [1] praecipiti celeritate abit.

XI. Paucis ante diebus Iunius Manliusque oppidum Nesattium, quo se principes Histrorum et regulus ipse Aepulo receperat, summa vi oppugnare
2 coeperant.[2] Eo Claudius duabus legionibus novis adductis, vetere exercitu cum suis ducibus dimisso, ipse oppidum circumsedit et vineis oppugnare in-
3 tendit,[3] amnemque praeterfluentem moenia, qui et impedimento oppugnantibus erat et aquationem Histris praebebat, multorum dierum opere exceptum
4 novo [4] alveo avertit. Ea res barbaros miraculo terruit abscisae aquae: [5] et ne tum quidem memores pacis, in caedem coniugum ac liberorum versi, etiam ut spectaculo hostibus tam foedum facinus esset,
5 palam in muris trucidatos praecipitabant. Inter simul complorationem feminarum puerorumque, simul nefandam caedem, milites transgressi murum oppi-
6 dum intrarunt. Cuius capti tumultum ubi [6] ex pavido

[1] aeque ac prius Florebellus: aeqvaeamplivs V.
[2] oppugnare coeperant Weissenborn: oppvgnant V.
[3] intendit Fr.: interditam V.
[4] nouo Fr.: nova V.
[5] abscisae aquae Fr.: abscisaqvae V.
[6] tumultum ubi Vahlen: tvmvli V.

enlisted for the province of Histria should assemble B.C. 177 at Aquileia, lest anything delay him at Rome from announcing his vows and setting out from the City in uniform. This was done by his colleague as he requested, and an early date for the muster was proclaimed. Claudius almost overtook his own letter. On his arrival he delivered a speech on the conduct of Manlius and Junius, and after tarrying not more than three days at Rome, with his lictors in uniform and having proclaimed his vows on the Capitoline, he went off to his province with the same headlong speed as before.

XI. A few days before this Junius and Manlius had begun to assault with all their might the town of Nesattium,[1] to which the leading men of the Histrians and even their chieftain Aepulo had withdrawn. There Claudius, bringing up the two new legions and sending away the old army with its commanders, himself invested the town and prosecuted the siege with sheds; and a river which flowed past the walls and was both a hindrance to the besiegers and a water-supply to the Histrians, after many days' toil he diverted and led off by a new channel. This act, by its miraculous cutting off of the water, terrified the barbarians; but, with no thought of peace even then, turning to the slaughter of their wives and children, in order that so horrible a deed might be in full view of the enemy also, they openly slew them on the walls and cast their bodies down. In the midst of the simultaneous wailing of women and children and the dreadful slaughter, the soldiers scaled the wall and entered the town. When the chief heard the din of its capture from the clamore fugientium accepit rex, traiecit ferro pectus, 7 ne vivus caperetur; ceteri capti aut occisi. Duo deinde oppida, Mutila et Faveria, vi capta et deleta. 8 Praeda, ut in gente inopi, spe maior fuit, et omnis militibus concessa est. Quinque milia capitum sescenta triginta duo sub corona venierunt. Auc- 9 tores belli virgis caesi et securi percussi. Histria tota trium oppidorum excidio et morte regis pacata est; omnesque undique populi obsidibus datis in dicionem venerunt.

[1] This town lay in a northerly direction from Pola.

A.U.C. 577

10 Sub Histrici finem belli apud Ligures concilia de bello haberi coepta.

XII. Ti. Claudius proconsul, qui praetor priore anno fuerat, cum praesidio legionis unius Pisis prae- 2 erat. Cuius litteris senatus certior factus, eas ipsas litteras ad C. Claudium—nam alter consul iam in 3 Sardiniam traiecerat—deferendas censet et adicit decretum, quoniam Histria provincia confecta esset si ei videretur exercitum traduceret in Ligures. 4 Simul ex litteris consulis, quas de rebus in Histria gestis scripserat, in biduum supplicatio decreta. Et ab[1] altero consule Ti.[2] Sempronio in Sardinia pros- 5 pere res gesta.[3] Exercitum in agrum Sardorum Iliensium induxit. Balarorum magna auxilia Iliensibus venerant; cum utraque gente signis collatis conflixit. Fusi fugatique hostes castrisque exuti, 6 duodecim milia armatorum caesa. Postero die arma

[1] ab add. Fr. [2] Ti. Fr.: iis V.
[3] gesta Kreyssig: gestia V.

[1] For the progressive development of the meaning of the phrase provincia confecta, cf. XL. xxxv. 4 and the note.

[2] The Ilienses were of a different stock from the Balari; both stocks were included under the common designation Sardi.

terrified cries of the fugitives, he stabbed himself B.C. 177 with his sword, so as not to be taken alive; the rest were captured or killed. Next two towns, Mutila and Faveria, were taken by storm and destroyed. The booty, considering the poverty of the people, was greater than they had hoped, and all of it was given to the soldiers. Five thousand six hundred and thirty-two captives were sold at auction. The persons responsible for the war were scourged and beheaded. All Histria, through the destruction of three towns and the death of its king, was pacified; and all the surrounding tribes gave hostages and surrendered.

Toward the end of the Histrian war the Ligurians began to hold councils regarding war.

XII. Tiberius Claudius the proconsul, who had been praetor the preceding year, was in command at Pisa with a garrison of one legion. The senate, informed by his dispatches, voted that these same dispatches should be forwarded to Gaius Claudius—for by now the other consul had crossed to Sardinia—and added a decree that, since the province of Histria had been subdued,[1] he should, if it seemed wise to him, lead the army against the Ligurians. At the same time, in consequence of the dispatches of the consul, which he had written regarding events in Histria, a thanksgiving for two days was decreed. The other consul, Tiberius Sempronius, also conducted in Sardinia a successful campaign. He led the army into the country of the Sardinian Ilienses.[2] Strong reinforcements of the Balari had come to the Ilienses; he fought in pitched battle with both tribes. The enemy was repulsed and routed and stripped of his camp; twelve thousand armed men were slain.

A.U.C. 577

lecta conici in acervum iussit consul sacrumque id Vulcano cremavit. Victorem exercitum in hiberna
7 sociarum urbium reduxit. Et C. Claudius litteris Ti. Claudi et senatus consulto accepto ex Histria
8 legiones in Ligures transduxit. Ad Scultennam flumen in campos progressi castra habebant hostes, ibi cum iis acie dimicatum. Quindecim milia caesa, plus septingenti [1] aut in proelio aut in castris—nam ea quoque expugnata sunt—capti, et signa militaria
9 unum et quinquaginta capta. Ligures, reliquiae caedis, in montes refugerunt, passimque populanti [2] campestres agros consuli nulla usquam apparuerunt
10 arma. Claudius duarum gentium uno anno victor, duabus, quod raro alius, in consulatu pacatis [3] provinciis Romam revertit.[4]

XIII. Prodigia eo anno nuntiata: in Crustumino avem sanqualem quam vocant sacrum lapidem rostro
2 cecidisse, bovem in Campania locutam,[5] vaccam aeneam Syracusis ab agresti tauro qui a pecore [6]
3 aberrasset, initam ac semine adspersam. In Crustumino diem unum in ipso loco supplicatio fuit, et in Campania bos alenda publice data, Syracusanumque

[1] septingenti Fr.: dit (sic) V.
[2] passimque populanti Madvig: passimpopvlantiqvae V.
[3] pacatis Fr.: pacatisqve V: subactis pacatisque Rossbach.
[4] revertit Fr.: evertit V.
[5] locutam Jakob Gronovius: locvtvm V.
[6] a pecore Hertz: pecora V.

---

[1] This river, rising in the Apennines, flowed past Modena, cf. Strabo V. i. 12.

[2] Festus (p. 317) says that the bird in commentariis auguralibus ossifraga ('bonebreaker') appellatur. Pliny (N.H. X. vii. 20) was uncertain as to the meaning of the word

The next day the consul ordered the weapons to be collected, heaped up in a pile and burned as an offering to Vulcan. He led the conquering army back into winter quarters in allied cities. And Gaius Claudius, on receipt of the letter of Tiberius Claudius and the decree of the senate, led the legions over from Histria against the Ligurians. The enemy had advanced into the plains and encamped near the river Scultenna,[1] and there he fought them in line of battle. Fifteen thousand were killed, more than seven hundred captured, either in the battle or in the camp—for it too was taken—and fifty-one military standards. The Ligurians, the remnants left by the slaughter, fled to the mountains, and no armed force showed itself to the consul anywhere as he ravaged the farms in the plains far and wide. Claudius, victorious over two peoples in one year, and having pacified two provinces in his consulship, a thing which had rarely happened, returned to Rome. B.C. 177

XIII. Prodigies were reported that year: in the territory of Crustumerium they say that a bird, called sanqualis[2] cut a sacred stone[3] with its beak, that in Campania a cow spoke, that at Syracuse a brazen heifer was approached and impregnated by a wild bull which had strayed from its herd. In the territory of Crustumerium a day of prayer was held on the actual spot,[4] and in Campania the cow was consigned to maintenance at the expense of the state. Atonement was made for the prodigy at sanqualis, which may have been related to the name of the god Sangus (XXXII. i. 10); cf. Festus 371; quia in Sangi dei tutela est.

[3] Perhaps a boundary or sepulchral stone or a dedication.

[4] I.e., at the spot where the portent occurred, not in Rome.

A.U.C. 577

prodigium expiatum editis ab haruspicibus dis, quibus supplicaretur.

4 Pontifex eo anno mortuus est M. Claudius Marcellus, qui consul censorque fuerat. In eius locum suffectus est pontifex filius eius M. Marcellus. Et Lunam[1] colonia eodem anno duo milia civium 5 Romanorum sunt deducta. Triumviri deduxerunt P. Aelius M. Aemilius Lepidus[2] Cn. Sicinius; quinquagena et singula iugera et semisses agri in singulos dati sunt. De Liguribus[3] captus ager erat; Etruscorum ante quam Ligurum fuerat.

6 C. Claudius consul ad urbem venit; cui, cum in senatu de rebus in Histria Liguribusque prospere gestis disseruisset,[4] postulanti triumphus est decretus. Triumphavit in magistratu de duabus simul gentibus. 7 Tulit in eo triumpho denarium[5] trecenta septem milia et victoriatum octoginta quinque milia septingentos duos. Militibus in singulos quini deni 8 denarii dati, duplex centurioni, triplex equiti. Sociis dimidio minus quam civibus datum. Itaque taciti ut iratos esse sentires, secuti sunt currum.[6]

XIV. Cum is[7] triumphus de Liguribus agebatur, Ligures postquam senserunt non consularem tantum

[1] Lunam Fr.: vna V.
[2] M. Aemilius Lepidus Kreyssig: legibvs V.
[3] Liguribus Heraeus: ligvres V.
[4] disseruisset add. Fr.
[5] denarium Fr.: denaria V.
[6] currum Fr.: cvrrvs V.
[7] cum is add. Drakenborch.

[1] He was consul in 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxiv. 1) and censor in 189 B.C. (XXXVII. lviii. 2).

[2] An Illyrian coin originally, worth three-fourths of a denarius; cf. Pliny N.H. XXX. iii. 46.

Syracuse, the gods to whom supplication should be made having been announced by the haruspices. B.C. 177

That year occurred the death of the pontiff Marcus Claudius Marcellus, who had been consul and censor.[1] In his place was substituted in the priesthood his son Marcus Marcellus. Also in that year a colony of two thousand Roman citizens was established at Luna. The board of three which established it consisted of Publius Aelius, Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Gnaeus Sicinius; the allotment to each colonist was fifty-one and one half iugera. The land had been taken from the Ligurians; it had belonged to the Etruscans before the Ligurians.

Gaius Claudius the consul came to the City: when he had given an account in the senate of his successful operations in Histria and among the Ligurians, on his request a triumph was decreed. He triumphed during his term of office over two peoples at once. He carried in procession in his triumph three hundred and seven thousand denarii, eighty-five thousand seven hundred and two victoriati.[2] Each of the infantry received fifteen denarii, the centurions twice, the cavalry each thrice that sum. To the allies[3] a half less was given than to the citizens. And so they followed the car in silence, so that you could perceive that they were angry.

XIV. While this triumph over the Ligurians was being celebrated, when the Ligurians perceived that not only had the consular army been taken away to [3] The custom, at least in recent years, had been to give the Latin allies the same donatives as the Romans (vii. 3 above and the note). The treatment in this case may be part of the general discrimination against them (cf. ix. 9–12 above).

A.U.C. 577

2 exercitum Romam abductum, sed legionem ab Ti. Claudio Pisis dimissam, soluti metu, clam exercitu indicto, per transversos limites [1] superatis montibus in campos degressi, agrum Mutinensem populati, 3 repentino impetu coloniam ipsam ceperunt. Id ubi Romam allatum est, senatus C.[2] Claudium consulem comitia primo quoque tempore habere iussit creatisque in annum magistratibus in provinciam redire et coloniam ex hostibus eripere. Ita, uti 4 censuit senatus, comitia habita. Consules creati Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispallus, Q. Petilius Spurinus. 5 Praetores inde facti M. Popilius Laenas, P. Licinius Crassus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papirius Maso, M. 6 Aburius, L. Aquilius Gallus. C. Claudio consuli prorogatum in annum imperium et Gallia provincia; et ne Histri idem,[3] quod et Ligures, facerent, socios nominis Latini in Histriam mitteret, quos triumphi causa de provincia deduxisset.

A.U.C. 578

7 Cn. Cornelio et Q. Petilio consulibus, quo die magistratum inierunt, immolantibus Iovi singulis bubus uti solet, in ea hostia, qua Q.[4] Petilius sacrificavit, in iocinere caput non inventum. Id cum ad 8 senatum rettulisset, bove perlitare iussus. De provinciis deinde consultus senatus Pisas et[5] Ligures 9 provincias consulibus decrevit; cui Pisae provincia

[1] limites Fr.: milites V.
[2] senatus C. Fr.: sc (sic, id est, senatus consultum) V.
[3] idem Kreyssig: quoque idem Fr.: qvidem V.
[4] qua Q. Fr.: qvaeqve V.
[5] Pisas et Fr.: ipsased V.

---

[1] It was especially fortunate if favourable omens were secured from the first victim (XXXVI. i. 3); if not, the sacrifice was repeated.

Rome, but even the legion sent back from Pisa by B.C. 177
Tiberius Claudius, being now freed from fear, secretly mustering an army they crossed the mountains by side roads and came down into the plains, and after devastating the lands around Mutina captured the colony itself by a surprise attack. When this was reported at Rome, the senate instructed the consul Gaius Claudius to hold the elections at the earliest possible moment, and after choosing the magistrates for the year to return to the province and rescue the colony from the enemy. The elections were held as the senate had decreed. The consuls chosen were Gnaeus Cornelius Scipio Hispallus and Quintus Petilius Spurinus. Next the praetors were elected, Marcus Popilius Laenas, Publius Licinius Crassus, Marcus Cornelius Scipio, Lucius Papirius Maso, Marcus Aburius, Lucius Aquilius Gallus. The imperium of Gaius Claudius the consul, together with his assignment to Gaul, was extended for a year; he was also instructed, in order to prevent the Histrians from doing the same thing that the Ligurians had done, to send to Histria the allies of the Latin confederacy whom he had withdrawn from the province by reason of his triumph.

The consuls, Gnaeus Cornelius and Quintus Petilius, B.C. 176 on the day of their inauguration, sacrificed each an ox to Jupiter, as is usual, but in the victim which Quintus Petilius sacrificed no head to the liver was found. When this was announced to the senate he was instructed to continue sacrificing cattle until a favourable omen was secured.[1] The senate next, when consulted about the provinces, decreed Pisa and the Ligurians as provinces for the consuls; the consul to whom Pisa should have fallen as a obvenisset, cum magistratuum creandorum tempus

A.U.C. 578

10 esset, ad comitia reverti iussit. Additum decreto ut binas legiones novas scriberent et trecenos equites; et dena milia peditum sociis nominique Latino et 11 sescenos imperarent equites. Ti.[1] Claudio prorogatum est imperium in id tempus quo in provinciam consul venisset.

XV. Dum de iis rebus in[2] senatu agitur, Cn. Cornelius evocatus a viatore, cum templo egressus esset, paulo post redit confuso vultu et exposuit patribus conscriptis bovis sescenaris quem immo-
2 lavisset iocur diffluxisse.[3] Id se victimario nuntianti parum credentem ipsum aquam effundi ex olla ubi exta coquerentur iussisse et vidisse ceteram integram partem extorum, iecur omne inenarrabili tabe[4]
3 absumptum. Territis eo prodigio patribus et alter consul curam adiecit, qui se, quod caput iocineri
4 defuisset, tribus bubus perlitasse negavit. Senatus maioribus hostiis usque ad litationem sacrificari iussit. Ceteris diis perlitatum ferunt; Saluti Petilium perlitasse negant. Inde consules praetoresque provincias
5 sortiti. Pisae Cn. Cornelio, Ligures Q.[5] Petilio obvenerunt. Praetores L. Papirius Maso urbanam,

[1] Ti. Sigonius: C. V. [2] in add. Fr.
[3] diffluxisse Perizonius: deflvxisse V.
[4] inenarrabili tabe Kreyssig: inenarrabilitate V.
[5] Q. add. Jakob Gronovius.

[1] Pisa had usually belonged to the Ligurian province, but now was a separate province, cf. XXXVIII. 35. 8.

[2] Such prorogations were usually thought unnecessary since a commander normally remained until he was relieved, even without orders.

[3] The meaning of the adjective sescenaris is unknown; and no attempt to emend has been successful.

province[1] was ordered to return for the elections B.C. 176 on the arrival of the time of choosing magistrates. It was added to the decree that they should each enroll two new legions and three hundred cavalry; and that each should call upon the allies of the Latin confederacy for ten thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry. The imperium of Tiberius Claudius was extended until such time as the consul should have come to the province.[2]

XV. While these matters were being discussed in the senate, Gnaeus Cornelius, summoned by a messenger, left the senate-house, and shortly afterward returned with a troubled expression and reported to the Conscript Fathers that the liver of a sescenaris ox[3] which he had sacrificed had melted away. He added that, scarcely believing the man in charge of the victims when he reported this, he had himself directed that the water be poured out of the kettle in which the entrails were being boiled and had seen all the rest of the entrails complete, but the whole liver had been consumed by an indescribable wasting. To the Fathers, already terrified by this portent, the other consul brought additional anxiety by reporting that he had failed to obtain a favourable omen after sacrificing three cattle, as the head of the liver had been missing. The senate directed him to continue sacrificing full-grown victims until he received a favorable omen. They say that in the case of the other gods they were obtained; to Salus, they say, Petilius could find no good omen. Then the consuls and praetors drew lots for their provinces. Pisa fell to Gnaeus Cornelius in the drawing, the Ligurians to Quintus Petilius. Of the praetors, Lucius Papirius Maso

A.U.C. 578

M. Aburius inter peregrinos sortiti sunt. M. Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis Hispaniam ulteriorem, 6 L. Aquilius Gallus Siciliam habuit. Duo deprecati sunt ne in provincias irent, M. Popilius in Sardiniam: Gracchum eam provinciam pacare; ei T. Aebutium 7 praetorem adiutorem ab senatu datum esse. Interrumpi tenorem rerum, in quibus peragendis continuatio ipsa efficacissima esset, minime convenire; 8 inter traditionem imperii novitatemque successoris, quae noscendis prius quam agendis rebus imbuenda sit, saepe bene gerendae rei occasiones intercidere.[1] 9 Probata Popilii excusatio est. P. Licinius Crassus sacrificiis se impediri sollemnibus excusabat ne in provinciam iret; ei[2] citerior Hispania obvenerat. 10 Ceterum aut ire iussus aut iurare pro contione sollemni sacrificio se prohiberi. Id ubi in P. Licinio ita statutum est, et ab se uti iusiurandum[3] acciperent M. Cornelius postulavit ne in Hispaniam ulteriorem iret. 11 Praetores ambo in eadem verba iurarunt.[4] M. Titinius et T.[5] Fonteius proconsules manere cum eodem imperii iure in Hispania iussi; et ut in supplementum his tria milia civium Romanorum cum

[1] intercidere Fr.: intercedere V.
[2] ei add. Gitlbauer.
[3] iusiurandum Fr.: ivreivrando V.
[4] iurarunt Crévier: ivreivrarvnt V.
[5] T. add. Fr.

[1] While the argument of Popilius for continued command during a campaign is sound, one wonders what was responsible for the sudden unwillingness to assume provincial duties at this time, when most magistrates were rather too eager for them.

gained by lot the civil jurisdiction, Marcus Aburius B.C. 176 that between citizens and aliens. Marcus Cornelius Scipio Maluginensis had Farther Spain and Lucius Aquilius Gallus Sicily. Two asked to be excused from going to their provinces, Marcus Popilius to Sardinia: Gracchus, he said, was pacifying that province; the praetor Titus Aebutius had been assigned him as an assistant by the senate. That the regular course of business should be interrupted, in the completion of which mere continuity was most effective, was by no means expedient; during a transfer of command and the novitiate of the successor, which had to be devoted to learning things rather than doing them, opportunities for successful operations were often lost.[1] The plea of Popilius was accepted. Publius Licinius Crassus alleged that he was hindered by obligatory sacrifices from going to his province; Nearer Spain had fallen to his lot. But he was ordered either to go or to take oath before the assembly that he was prevented by an obligatory sacrifice.[2] When this had been approved in the case of Publius Licinius, Marcus Cornelius also demanded that they should accept his oath, as an excuse for not going to Farther Spain. Both praetors swore in the same formula. Marcus Titinius and Titus Fonteius the proconsuls were instructed to remain in Spain with the same prerogative of command; it was also ordered that as reinforcements for them three thousand Roman citizens and two hundred cavalry, five thousand [2] The character of the oath is more explicitly stated in XLII. xxxii. 2, where it appears that as consul Licinius was less constrained by it.

A.U.C. 578

equitibus ducentis, quinque milia socium Latini nominis et trecenti equites mitterentur.

XVI. Latinae feriae fuere ante diem tertium nonas Maias, in quibus quia in una hostia magistratus Lanuvinus precatus non erat populo Romano Quiritium, religioni fuit. Id cum ad senatum relatum esset senatusque ad pontificum collegium reiecisset, pontificibus, quia non recte factae Latinae essent, instaurari Latinas [1] placuit, Lanuvinos, quorum opera instaurandae [2] essent, hostias praebere. Accesserat ad religionem, quod [3] Cn. Cornelius consul ex monte Albano rediens concidit et, parte membrorum captus ad Aquas Cumanas profectus ingravescente morbo Cumis decessit. Sed inde mortuus Romam allatus et funere magnifico elatus sepultusque est. Pontifex idem fuerat. Consul Q. Petilius cum primum per auspicia posset, collegae subrogando comitia habere iussus et Latinas edicere, comitia in ante [4] diem tertium nonas Sextiles, Latinas [5] in ante diem tertium idus Sextiles edixit. Plenis religionum animis prodigia insuper nuntiata: Tusculi facem in caelo visam, Gabiis aedem Apollinis et privata aedificia complura, Graviscis murum portamque de caelo tacta. Ea [6] patres procurari uti pontifices censuissent iusserunt.

[1] instaurari Latinas Vahlen: instavratislatinis V.
[2] instaurandae Drakenborch: instavrati V.
[3] quod add. Fr.
[4] ante add. Sigonius.
[5] Latinas add. Fr. [6] tacta. ea Fr.: tactae V.

[1] Cf. XXXII. i. 9 and the note.
[2] An accidental omission of a phrase from a formula might, in Roman thinking, vitiate the whole formula.
[3] Possibly the spa near Baiae.

infantry and three hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy should be sent. B.C. 176

XVI. The Latin festival[1] was held on the third day before the Nones of May, and a religious scruple arose because at the sacrifice of one victim the magistrate of Lanuvium had not prayed for the Roman people,[2] the Quirites. When this was reported to the senate and the senate had referred the question to the college of pontiffs, the decree of the pontiffs was that the Latin festival should be repeated, since it had not been correctly performed, and that the people of Lanuvium, to whom was due the necessity of the repetition, should furnish the victims. Their religious fear was increased by the fact that Gnaeus Cornelius the consul fell on his return from the Alban Mount, and, paralyzed in some of his limbs, set out for Aquae Cumanae[3] and, his illness growing more severe, died at Cumae. But after his death he was removed to Rome and was carried out and buried with an elaborate funeral. He was, in addition to being consul, a pontiff. The consul Quintus Petilius, as soon as the auspices permitted, was ordered to hold an election to choose his colleague and to proclaim the Latin festival; the election he declared for the third day before the Nones of August, the festival for the third day before the Ides of August. At a time when men's minds were already filled with religious fears, to add to them prodigies were reported: at Tusculum, a firebrand was seen in the sky, and at Gabii the temple of Apollo and numerous private houses, at Gravisca the wall and gate, were struck by lightning. The Fathers ordered expiation for these, in a manner to be prescribed by the pontiffs.

A.U.C. 578

7 Dum consules primum religiones, deinde alterum alterius mors et comitia et Latinarum instauratio [1] impediunt, interim C. Claudius exercitum ad Mutinam
8 quam Ligures priore anno ceperant admovit. Intra [2] triduum quam oppugnare coeperat, receptam ex hostibus colonis restituit. Octo milia ibi Ligurum intra muros caesa; litteraeque Romam extemplo scriptae, quibus non modo rem exponeret, sed etiam gloriaretur sua virtute ac felicitate neminem iam cis Alpes esse [3] hostem populi Romani,[4] agrique aliquantum captum, qui multis milibus hominum dividi viritim posset.

XVII. Et Ti. Sempronius eodem tempore in Sardinia multis secundis proeliis Sardos perdomuit.
2 Quindecim milia hostium sunt caesa, omnes Sardorum populi qui defecerant in dicionem redacti. Stipendiariis veteribus duplex vectigal imperatum
3 exactumque; ceteri frumentum contulerunt. Pacata provincia obsidibusque ex tota insula ducentis triginta acceptis, legati Romam qui ea nuntiarent missi quique [5] ab senatu peterent ut ob eas res ductu auspicioque Ti. Semproni [6] prospere gestas diis immortalibus honos haberetur, ipsique decedenti de
4 provincia exercitum secum deportare [7] liceret. Se-

[1] instauratio Kreyssig: instavratione V.
[2] intra Perizonius: ante V.
[3] esse add. Weissenborn.
[4] populi Romani ed. Lugdunensis 1553: pro V.
[5] quique Fr.: qvoqve V.
[6] Sempronii Fr.: sempronivs V.
[7] secum deportare Fr.: secvndaeportare V.

[1] Sardinia, like Sicily, was organized on the tithe-system of Hiero, but some persons or communities paid in cash. It is not clear whether this increase was a permanent doubling of the rate or a temporary penalty.

While the two consuls were delayed first by B.C. 176 religious observances, then one consul by the death of the other and the election and the repetition of the Latin festival, in the meantime Gaius Claudius led the army toward Mutina, which the Ligurians had captured the year before. Within three days from the beginning of the siege he recovered it and restored it to the colonists. Eight thousand of the Ligurians perished there within the walls; and dispatches were at once sent to Rome, in which he not only stated the facts but also boasted that as a result of his valour and good fortune there was no longer an enemy of the Roman people on this side of the Alps, and that a large amount of land had been captured which could be divided individually among many thousands of men.

XVII. At the same time also Tiberius Sempronius in Sardinia completely subdued the Sardinians in many successful battles. Fifteen thousand men were killed, and all the tribes of the Sardinians who had revolted were reduced to submission. Upon those who had been tributaries before, double taxes were imposed and levied, the rest contributed grain.[1] Now that he had pacified the province and received two hundred and thirty hostages from the whole island, he sent lieutenants to Rome to report these events and to ask the senate that by reason of the successes obtained under the leadership and auspices of Tiberius Sempronius honour should be paid to the immortal gods and that Sempronius himself, on his departure from the province, should be permitted to bring back his army.[2] The senate, meeting in the [2] The last request was a preliminary to an application for a triumph: cf. XL. XXXV. 6 and the note.

A.U.C. 578

natus in aede Apollinis legatorum verbis auditis supplicationem in biduum decrevit, et quadraginta maioribus hostiis consules sacrificare iussit, Ti. Sempronium proconsulem exercitumque eo anno in provincia manere.

5 Comitia deinde consulis unius subrogandi, quae in[1] ante diem tertium nonas Sextiles edicta erant, 6 eo ipso die sunt confecta. Q. Petilius consul collegam, qui extemplo magistratum occiperet, creavit C. Valerium Laevinum. Ipse iam[2] diu cupidus provinciae, cum opportunae cupiditati eius litterae adlatae essent Ligures rebellasse, nonis Sextilibus paludatus. . . .[3] Senatus[4] litteris auditis tumultus 7 eius causa legionem tertiam ad C. Claudium proconsulem in Galliam proficisci iussit, et duumviros navales cum classe Pisas ire, qui Ligurum oram, maritimum quoque terrorem admoventes, circum- 8 vectarentur. Eodem Pisas et Q. Petilius consul ad 9 conveniendum exercitui diem[5] edixerat. Et C. Claudius proconsul audita rebellione Ligurum praeter eas copias quas secum Parmae habebat subitariis collectis militibus exercitum ad fines Ligurum admovit.

XVIII. Hostes sub adventum C. Claudi, a quo duce se meminerant nuper ad Scultennam flumen victos fugatosque, locorum magis praesidio adversus infeliciter expertam vim quam armis se defensuri, duos

[1] quae in add. Sigonius.
[2] ipse iam Madvig: iisetiam V.
[3] lacunam indicavit Duker.
[4] senatus add. Heusinger.
[5] exercitui diem Fr.: exercitvm V.

[1] While I have not ventured to print Vahlen's restoration as part of the text, I have translated its substance.

temple of Apollo, heard the words of the lieutenants, B.C. 176 decreed a thanksgiving for two days, ordered the consuls to sacrifice forty full-grown victims, and directed Tiberius Sempronius the proconsul and the army to remain that year in the province.

Then the election for the purpose of filling the one vacancy in the consulship, which had been announced for the third day before the Nones of August, was finished the same day. Quintus Petilius the consul declared Gaius Valerius Laevinus chosen as his colleague, to enter upon his office at once. He himself had long been eager for his province, when, fortunately for his ambition, dispatches arrived that the Ligurians had rebelled, and on the Nones of August he set out in uniform [for his province and sent back a letter concerning his achievements there.[1]] The senate, hearing the letter, by reason of the uprising ordered the third legion to set out to join Gaius Claudius the proconsul in Gaul, and the duumviri navales to proceed with the fleet to Pisa, in order to sail along the coast of the Ligurians, spreading terror by sea as well. At the same destination, Pisa, the consul Quintus Petilius had also named a rendezvous for his army. And Gaius Claudius the proconsul, hearing of the revolt of the Ligurians, in addition to the troops which he had with him at Parma, raised emergency troops and moved his army to the frontiers of the Ligurians.

XVIII. The enemy, on the arrival of Gaius Claudius, by whom as commander they recalled that recently at the Scultenna river they had been defeated and put to flight, with a view to defending themselves by the protection of the country rather than by arms against an attack which had turned out montes Letum et Ballistam ceperunt muroque[1] 2 insuper amplexi sunt.[2] Tardius ex agris demigrantes 3 oppressi ad mille et quingenti perierunt; ceteri montibus se tenebant, et ne in metu quidem feritatis ingenitae obliti saeviunt in praedam quae Mutinae parta erat. Captivos cum foeda laceratione interficiunt; pecora in fanis trucidant verius passim quam 4 rite sacrificant. Satiati caede animantium, quae inanima erant parietibus adfligunt,[3] vasa omnis generis usui magis quam ornamento in speciem 5 facta. Q. Petilius consul, ne absente se debellaretur, litteras ad C. Claudium misit ut cum exercitu ad se in Galliam veniret: Campis Macris se eum 6 expectaturum. Litteris acceptis Claudius ex Liguribus castra movit exercitumque ad Campos Macros consuli tradidit. Eodem[4] paucis post diebus 7 C. Valerius consul alter venit. Ibi divisis copiis, prius[5] quam digrederentur,[6] communiter ambo exercitus lustraverunt. Tum sortiti, quia non ab eadem utrumque parte aggredi hostem placebat, 8 regiones quas peterent. Valerium auspicato sortitum constabat, quod in templo fuisset; in Petilio

A.U.C. 578

[1] muroque Fr.: mvrosqve V.
[2] sunt add. Duker.
[3] adfligvnt (ex corr.) V.: adfligunt coni. edd. nonnulli.
[4] eodem Fr.: eodemtempore V.
[5] prius add. Fr.
[6] digrederentur ed. Frob. 1535: congrederentvr V.

[1] Cf. supra, xii. 8.
[2] Most editors bracket either ornamento or in speciem as a gloss on the other. I have retained both, also the MS. adfligunt unhappily[1] for them, occupied the two mountains, B.C. 176 Letum and Ballista, and in addition surrounded them by a wall. Those who were slow in moving from the fields were cut off and destroyed to the number of fifteen hundred; the rest kept within the mountains and not even in their fear forgetting their natural fierceness, they raged against the booty which had been taken at Mutina. The prisoners they slew after mutilating them cruelly; the beasts they butchered, scattered among the shrines, rather than sacrificed according to ritual. Sated with the slaughter of their living plunder, things which were inanimate, utensils of every sort, made for use rather than as ornaments to be looked at, they dashed against the walls.[2] The consul Quintus Petilius, fearing lest the war should be finished in his absence, wrote to Gaius Claudius that he should bring the army to meet him in Gaul: he would await them, he said, at Campi Macri.[3] Claudius, on receipt of the letter, moved his camp from the Ligurian territory and at Campi Macri turned his army over to the consul. Thither a few days later Gaius Valerius, the other consul, came. There, dividing their forces, before they separated the two jointly purified the armies. Then, because they had determined that the two should not approach the enemy from the same direction, they cast lots for the districts to which they should direct their march. It was evident that Valerius cast his lot in accordance with the requirements for auspices, because he was in the consecrated for the commonly accepted conjecture adfigunt; having finished with human beings they vented their rage upon inanimate objects.

[3] In the territory of Modena.

A.U.C. 578

id vitii [1] factum postea augures responderunt, quod extra templum sortem in sitellam † in templum 9 latam foris ipse oporteret.[2] Profecti inde [3] in diversas regiones. Petilius adversus Ballistae et Leti iugum, quod eos [4] montes perpetuo dorso inter se
10 iungit, castra habuit. Ibi adhortantem eum pro contione milites, immemorem ambiguitatis verbi, ominatum [5] ferunt se eo die Letum capturum [6] esse.
11 Duabus simul partibus subire in adversos montes coepit. Ea pars in qua ipse erat impigre succedebat. Alteram hostes cum propulissent, ut restitueret rem inclinatam, consul equo advectus suos quidem a [7] fuga revocavit, ipse, dum incautius ante signa obver-
12 satur, missili traiectus cecidit. Nec hostes ducem occisum senserunt, et suorum pauci qui viderant haud neglegenter, ut qui in eo victoriam verti scirent, 13 corpus occultavere. Alia multitudo peditum equitumque deturbatis hostibus montis sine duce cepere. Ad quinque milia Ligurum occisa; ex Romano 14 exercitu duo et quinquaginta ceciderunt. Super tam evidentem tristis ominis eventum etiam ex

[1] vitii Madvig: vitio V.
[2] quod . . . oporteret the reading of V. For various conjectural restorations see the apparatus of Giarratano and the note opposite under the translation.
[3] inde Fr.: in V.
[4] eos Fr.: eo V.
[5] verbi ominatum Fr.: verbisomniatvm V.
[6] capturum Fr.: factvrvm V.
[7] [statim] a fuga Weissenborn; media in fuga Madvig; e (vel ex) tam effusa fuga Hertz: etiamfuga V.

[1] The state of the text and our ignorance of the details of sortitio prevent our coming nearer than an approximation to the meaning. It is particularly difficult to determine what space; the augurs later declared that this fault had B.C. 176 existed in the case of Petilius—namely, the lot, which had been cast into the urn outside of the consecrated space, had been drawn by him while he was still outside of the consecrated area, although he should have been inside of it.[1] From Campi Macri they marched in different directions. Petilius had his camp facing the height of Ballista and Letum, which joins these mountains with a continuous ridge. Then, while he was encouraging the soldiers before the assembly, not thinking of the double meaning of the word, they said that he used the ominous expression that on that day he would gain Letum.[2] He began to march up the hills in front on two sides at once. The column in which he himself was advanced vigorously. When the enemy had repulsed the other, Petilius, in order to restore the wavering line, riding up on his horse, did indeed rally his men from their flight, but he himself, while riding before the standards with too little caution, fell struck with a javelin. But the enemy did not perceive that the commander had been killed, and the few of his own men who had seen it concealed his body with great care, knowing that victory depended on it. The rest of the body of infantry and cavalry dislodged the enemy and took the mountains without their general. About five thousand of the Ligurians were killed: of the Roman army fifty-two fell. In addition to this so manifest fulfilment of an omen of evil, it was happened since the error of Petilius was so slight that it escaped detection at the time.

[2] As a common noun, letum means "death." Valerius Maximus (I. v. 9) tells the same story: Hodie ego Letum utique capiam.

A.U.C. 578 pullario auditum est [1] vitium in auspicio fuisse, nec 15 id consulem ignorasse. C. Valerius audita.[2] . . .
16 Periti [3] religionum iurisque publici, quando duo ordinarii consules eius anni, alter morbo, alter ferro perisset, suffectum consulem negabant recte comitia habere posse. . . .[4] deduxit.

A.U.C. 579 XIX. Cis Appenninum Garuli et Lapicini et Hergates, trans Appenninum Friniates fuerant, intra [5] Audenam amnem. P. Mucius cum iis, qui Lunam Pisasque depopulati erant, bellum gessit, omnibusque
2 in dicionem redactis arma ademit. Ob eas res in

[1] est Fr.: se V.

[2] periit quaternio quartus codicis praeter f.g. a deduxit incipiens.

[3] verba Periti . . . posse ex Prisciani xvii xxix huc revocavit Sigonius.

[4] Vid. quae de audita dixi, supra § 15.

[5] intra Crévier: inter V.

---

[1] The manner of feeding of the sacred chickens determined whether the omens were favourable or unfavourable. The auspices were often taken thus before a battle.

[2] The loss of nearly an entire quaternion of V (see critical note) makes it impossible to determine the rest of the sentence. Livy's narrative recognizes the rashness of Petilius (cf. especially incautius ante signa in sec. 4), but the senate seems to have emphasized his bravery when it decreed that the legion was remiss in the performance of its duty, that its year's pay should be withheld and its wages reduced: cf. Valerius Maximus II. vii. 15 (confirmed by the briefer account in Frontinus, Stratagems IV. i. 46): Graviter senatus tulit, quod Q. Petilium consulem fortissime adversus Ligures pugnantem occidere milites passi essent. Legioni neque stipendium anni procedere neque aera dari voluit, quia pro salute imperatoris se telis non obtulerant.

Since V has suffered an equally heavy loss at the end of chap. xix., it is impossible to tell whether there was in Livy some reference to Macedonia.

also learned from the keeper of the chickens[1] that B.C. 176
there had been a flaw in the auspices, and that the consul had not been unaware of this. Gaius Valerius, hearing. . . .[2] Those who were skilled in the rules of religion and in public law said that, since the two regular consuls of the year had perished, the one from disease, the other in battle, a substituted consul could not properly conduct an election . . .[3] brought them down.

XIX. The Garuli, the Lapicini and the Hergates B.C. 175 had lived on this side of the Apennines, the Friniates beyond them and on this side of the river Audena.[4] Publius Mucius waged war on the tribes that had ravaged Luna and Pisa and disarmed them when all had been reduced to surrender. By reason of the [3] Sigonius inserted here this sentence quoted by Priscian (see the critical note) from Book XLI. It is obviously concerned with this year, since at no other time covered by this Book did both the regular consuls die in office. It appears that a consul suffectus, i.e. one elected to fill a vacancy, could not preside at an election. Their only recourse, then, was the appointment of an interrex, and this procedure and the elections for the year 175 B.C. were no doubt described in the text lost between posse and deduxit. The last word may refer to some such compulsory migrations as described in XL. XXXVIII. 2 ff.

The names of the magistrates for 175 B.C. can be recovered from the Fasti and other sources. The consuls were Mucius Scaevola (XIX. 1 below) and M. Aemilius Lepidus II (Oros. IV. XX. 34). The praetors were C. Popilius Laenas, T. Annius Luscus, C. Memmius Gallus (?), C. Cluvius Saxula, Ser. Cornelius Sulla, Ap. Claudius Cento.

[4] These tribes were perhaps those transported to new homes: see the preceding note. If the Friniates are the tribe mentioned in XXXIX. ii. 1, they seem to have lived cis Appenninum, although the flight of some of them beyond the mountains is reported in that chapter. The river Audena has not been identified.

A.U.C. 579

Gallia Liguribusque gestas duorum consulum ductu auspicioque senatus in triduum supplicationes decrevit et quadraginta hostiis sacrificari iussit.

3 Et tumultus quidem Gallicus et Ligustinus, qui principio eius anni exortus fuerat, haud magno
4 conatu[1] brevi oppressus erat; belli Macedonici subibat iam cura, miscente Perseo inter Dardanos Bastarnasque certamina. Et legati qui missi ad res visendas in Macedoniam erant, iam reverterant Romam renuntiaverantque bellum in Dardania esse.
5 Simul venerant et ab rege Perseo oratores qui purgarent nec accitos ab eo Bastarnas nec auctore
6 eo quidquam facere. Senatus nec liberavit[2] eius culpae regem neque arguit; moneri eum tantum modo iussit, ut etiam atque etiam curaret ut sanctum habere foedus quod ei cum Romanis esset,[3] videri
7 posset. Dardani cum Bastarnas non modo non excedere finibus suis, quod speraverant, sed graviores fieri in dies cernerent, subnixos Thracum accolarum et Scordiscorum auxiliis, audendum aliquid vel temere[4] rati, omnes undique armati ad oppidum quod proximum castris Bastarnarum erat con-

[1] magno conatu Fr.: magnvs conatvs V.
[2] nec liberavit Fr.: neliberare V.
[3] habere foedus quod ei cum Romanis esset Jakob Gronovius: haberetesse V.
[4] temere Fr.: temerare V.

---

[1] Cf. especially XL. lvii. for Philip's plan to profit by the wars of these peoples.

[2] This embassy has not been mentioned, since Livy has said little about Macedonian affairs since 178 B.C. He now proceeds to fill up that gap.

successes in Gaul and among the Ligurians under the B.C. 175 leadership and auspices of the two consuls, the senate decreed a thanksgiving for three days and ordered the sacrifice of forty victims.

And indeed the Gallic and Ligurian uprising, which had broken out in the beginning of the year, was quickly suppressed with no great effort; now the anxiety as to the Macedonian War beset them, since Perseus was stirring up conflicts between the Dardanians and the Bastarnae.[1] And the ambassadors[2] who had been sent to investigate the situation in Macedonia had already returned to Rome and had reported that war in Dardania was now in progress. At the same time envoys had also arrived from King Perseus, who were to explain on his behalf[3] that he had neither invited the Bastarnae nor was he instigating any of their actions. The senate neither absolved him of this blame nor charged him with it; they merely ordered that he be warned to take redoubled care to make it appear that he was respecting the treaty which was in force between him and the Romans.[4] When the Dardanians saw that the Bastarnae were not only not leaving their territory, as they had hoped, but were growing more troublesome every day, and were relying on the aid of the neighbouring Thracians and the Scordisci, they decided that they must venture something, even rashly, and all from all sides met in arms at the town which was nearest to the camp of the Bastarnae. It was winter,

[3] Appian, Macedonian Wars IX. xi. 1 refers to this embassy, which Livy has not mentioned before: ὁ δὲ Περσεὺς ἑτέρους ἔπεμπε πρέσβεις τὴν ὑπόνοιαν ἐκλύων.

[4] Cf. XL. lviii. 9. It would seem that the senate was satisfied with a show of observance of the treaty.

A.U.C. 579

8 veniunt. Hiems erat, et id anni tempus elegerant, ut Thraces Scordiscique in fines suos abirent. Quod ubi ita factum et solos iam esse Bastarnas audierunt, bifariam dividunt copias, pars ut recto itinere ad lacessendum ex aperto iret, pars devio saltu circum-
9 ducta ab tergo aggrederetur. Ceterum priusquam circumire castra hostium possent, pugnatum est; victique Dardani compelluntur in urbem, quae fere duodecim milia ab castris Bastarnarum aberat.
10 Victores confestim secuti [1] circumsidunt urbem, haud dubie postero die aut metu dedituris se hostibus aut
11 vi expugnaturi. Interim Dardanorum altera manus, quae circumducta erat, ignara cladis suorum, castra Bastarnarum sine praesidio relicta cepit.[2] . . .

XX. . . . Romano more,[3] sella eburnea posita, ius dicebat disceptabatque controversias minimarum
2 rerum. Adeoque nulli fortunae adhaerebat animus per omnia genera vitae errans, uti nec sibi nec aliis
3 quinam homo esset satis constaret. Non adloqui amicos, vix notis familiariter arridere, munificentia inaequali sese aliosque ludificari; quibusdam [4]

[1] secuti Vahlen: vti V.
[2] relicta cepit Madvig: relic V, sic desinens: vid. quae dixi supra de audita, xviii. 15.
[3] Romano more Muretus: more V, cuius quaternio V periit praeter f. 10.
[4] quibusdam Fr.: qvibvs V.

[1] At this point begins the other large lacuna, due to the loss of almost an entire quaternion of V. The narrative may have included an account of the tragic fate of the Bastarnae, who, returning home after the capture of their camp, were almost all drowned when the ice in the Danube broke while they were crossing (Orosius IV. xx). It must also have introduced and they had chosen that season in order that the B.C. 175

Thracians and Scordisci might then depart to their own countries. When they learned that this had occurred as they had expected and that the Bastarnae were now alone, they divided their forces into two columns, one to march by the straight road to assail openly, the other, led around by an out-of-the-way pass, to attack from the rear. But before they could surround the camp of the enemy the battle took place; and the defeated Dardanians were driven back into the town, which was about twelve miles distant from the camp of the Bastarnae. The victors followed in haste and invested the city, expecting confidently that the next day either the enemy would surrender on account of fear or they would take the town by storm. Meanwhile the other column of the Dardanians, which had followed the circuitous route, being ignorant of the defeat of their comrades, captured the camp of the Bastarnae, which had been left without a guard.[1]

XX. Antiochus, setting up an ivory chair in the Roman fashion, would administer justice and adjudge disputes on the most trifling matters. And so incapable was his mind of sticking to any station in life, as it strayed through all the varieties of existence that it was not really clear either to himself or to others what kind of person he was.[2] It was his habit not to speak to his friends, to smile at mere acquaintances in a most friendly way, and with an inconsistent generosity to make himself and others laugh-

Antiochus Epiphanes, long a hostage at Rome, who succeeded his brother on the throne of their father, Antiochus the Great.

[2] Polybius XXVI. i illustrates this: he would mix with all sorts of persons.

A.U.C. 579

honoratis magnoque aestimantibus se puerilia, ut escae aut lusus, munera dare, alios nihil expectantes ditare. Itaque nescire quid sibi vellet[1] quibusdam videri; quidam ludere eum simpliciter, quidam haud dubie insanire aiebant.[2] In duabus tamen magnis honestisque rebus vere regius erat animus, in urbium donis et deorum cultu. Megalopolitanis in Arcadia murum se circumdaturum urbi est pollicitus maioremque partem pecuniae dedit; Tegeae theatrum[3] magnificum e marmore facere instituit; Cyzici in[4] prytaneo—id est penetrale urbis, ubi publice, quibus is honos datus est, vescuntur—vasa aurea mensae unius posuit. Rhodiis ut[5] nihil unum insigne, ita omnis generis, ut quaeque usus eorum postulaverunt, dona dedit. Magnificentiae vero in deos vel Iovis Olympii templum Athenis, unum in terris incohatum pro magnitudine dei, potest testis[6] esse; sed et Delum aris insignibus statuarumque copia exornavit, et Antiochiae Iovis Capitolini magnificum templum, non laqueatum auro tantum, sed parietibus totis lammina inauratum, et alia multa in aliis locis pollicitus, quia perbreve tempus regni eius fuit, non perfecit. Spectaculorum quoque omnis generis magnificentia

[1] quid sibi vellet Fr.: qvidsivibivellet (sic) V.
[2] insanire aiebant Fr.: inseanebant (sic) V.
[3] Tegeae theatrum Fr.: thegetea V.
[4] in add. Fr.
[5] ut add. Freinsheim.
[6] testis add. Fr.

---

[1] This temple of Ζεὺς Ὀλύμπιος was begun by Pisistratus and completed by Hadrian: cf. Pausanias I. xviii. 6.

[2] He reigned eleven years in all, but his enthusiasm for building may not have begun at once.

ing-stocks; to some, men of distinction who held B.C. 175 themselves in high esteem, he would give childish presents, as of food or toys, others, who expected nothing, he would make rich. And so he seemed to some not to know what he wanted; some said that he was playing childish tricks, some that he was unquestionably insane. Nevertheless in two great and important respects his soul was truly royal—in his benefactions to cities and in the honours paid to the gods. To the people of Megalopolis in Arcadia he promised that he would enclose their city with a wall, and he gave the greater part of the money; at Tegea he began to build a magnificent theatre of marble; in the prytaneum at Cyzicus—this is the central hall of the city, where those men dine upon whom this distinction has been bestowed—he furnished a golden service for one table. While he gave the Rhodians nothing remarkable, yet he gave them gifts of every description, whatever their needs demanded. Of his magnificent ideas as to the treatment of the gods, the temple of Jupiter Olympius at Athens, the only one in the world which, though unfinished,[1] was designed to conform to the greatness of the god, can well be evidence; besides, he also adorned Delos with marvellous altars and abundance of statuary, and at Antioch he built a magnificent temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, which had not merely its ceiling panelled with gold, but also its walls wholly covered with gilded plates; and many other things he promised in other places, but by reason of the very short duration of his reign [2] he did not finish them. Also in regard to the splendour of his shows of every sort he surpassed earlier kings, his other spectacles being given in their own

A.U.C. 579 superiores reges vicit, reliquorum sui moris et copia
11 Graecorum artificum; gladiatorum munus, Romanae consuetudinis, primo maiore cum terrore hominum, insuetorum ad tale spectaculum, quam voluptate
12 dedit; deinde saepius dando et modo volneribus tenus, modo sine missione, etiam [1] familiare oculis gratumque id spectaculum fecit, et armorum stu-
13 dium [2] plerisque iuvenum accendit. Itaque qui primo [3] ab Roma magnis pretiis [4] paratos gladiatores accersere solitus erat, iam suo. . . .[5] Scipio [6] inter peregrinos.

A.U.C. 580 XXI. M. Atilio praetori provincia Sardinia obve-
2 nerat; sed cum legione nova quam consules conscripserant, quinque milibus peditum, trecentis equitibus in Corsicam iussus est transire. Dum is ibi bellum gereret, Cornelio prorogatum imperium,
3 uti obtineret Sardiniam. Cn. Servilio Caepioni in Hispaniam ulteriorem et P. Furio Philo in citeriorem tria milia peditum Romanorum,[7] equites centum quinquaginta, et socium Latini nominis quinque

[1] etiam Madvig: etiamet V.
[2] studium Fr.: stvdiorvm V.
[3] qui primo Fr.: primoqvi.
[4] pretiis Kreyssig: praedis V.
[5] a suo desinit V: vid. quae dixi supra de Romano more, XX. 1.
[6] Scipio Sigonius: pio V, f. 11r sic incipiens.
[7] peditum Romanorum Fr.: peditvmromanorvmpeditvm V.

---

[1] I.e., according to the Greek way of giving them.
[2] τεχνῖται of various kinds, such as actors, choristers, flutists, etc.
[3] I have supplied a possible conclusion to the sentence. The lacuna which follows doubtless recorded the elections for the year 174 B.C.: the last clause of the chapter records the proper [1] style and with an abundance of Greek thea- B.C. 175 trical artists;[2] a gladiatorial exhibition, after the Roman fashion, he presented which was at first received with greater terror than pleasure on the part of men who were unused to such sights; then by frequent repetitions, by sometimes allowing the fighters to go only as far as wounding one another, sometimes permitting them to fight without giving quarter, he made the sight familiar and even pleasing, and he roused in many of the young men a joy in arms. And so, while at first he had been accustomed to summon gladiators from Rome, procuring them by large fees, finally he could find a sufficient supply at home. . . .[3] Scipio the jurisdiction between citizens and aliens.

XXI. The lot had given the province of Sardinia B.C. 174 to Marcus Atilius the praetor; but he was ordered, with the new legion which the consuls had enlisted, consisting of five thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry, to cross over to Corsica. As long as he should be engaged in the war there, the imperium of Cornelius [4] was prolonged, in order that he might hold Sardinia. For Gnaeus Servilius Caepio in Farther Spain and for Publius Furius Philus in Nearer Spain were enlisted three thousand Roman infantry and one hundred and fifty cavalry, and of the allies of the Latin confederacy five thou-assignment of a praetorian province. The consuls for 174 B.C. were Sp. Postumius Albinus and Q. Mucius Scaevola; the praetors C. Cassius Longinus, P. Furius Philus, L. Claudius Asellus, M. Atilius Serranus, Cn. Servilius Caepio and L. (or Cn.) Cornelius Scipio son of Africanus (cf. the note to xxvii. 2 below).

[4] Probably Servius Cornelius Sulla: cf. the note to xviii. 16 above.

A.U.C. 580

milia peditum, trecenti equites, Sicilia L. Claudio
4 sine supplemento decreta. Duas praeterea legiones consules scribere iussi cum iusto numero peditum equitumque, et decem milia peditum sociis imperare
5 et sescentos equites. Dilectus consulibus eo difficilior erat quod pestilentia quae priore anno in boves ingruerat [1] eo verterat [2] in hominum morbos. Qui inciderant, haud facile septimum diem superabant; qui superaverant, longinquo, maxime quartanae,
6 implicabantur morbo. Servitia maxime moriebantur; eorum strages per omnes vias insepultorum erat. Ne liberorum quidem funeribus Libitina sufficiebat. Cadavera intacta a canibus ac volturibus [3]
7 tabes absumebat; satisque constabat nec illo nec priore anno in tanta strage boum hominumque
8 volturium usquam visum. Sacerdotes publici ea pestilentia mortui sunt Cn. Servilius Caepio pontifex, pater praetoris, et Ti. Sempronius Ti. filius Longus decemvir sacrorum et P. Aelius Paetus augur et Ti. Sempronius Gracchus et C. Mamilius Atellus [4] curio maximus et [5] M. Sempronius Tuditanus
9 pontifex.[6] Pontifices suffecti sunt C. Sulpicius Galba . . .[7] in locum Tuditani. Augures suffecti

[1] ingruerat Fr.: ingrveret V.
[2] verterat Sigonius: verteret V.
[3] vulturibus Fr.: volneribvs V.
[4] C. Mamilius Atellus Wesenberg: C. atellivs. aemilivs (sic) V.
[5] et add. ed. Frobeniana 1535
[6] pontifex add. Fr.
[7] lacunam indicavit Fr.; pro supplementis multi multa frustra.

[1] A malady of the ague type, more serious every fourth day.
[2] Cf. XL. xix. 3.

sand infantry and three hundred cavalry, and Sicily B.C. 174 was decreed to Lucius Claudius without reinforcements. The consuls were directed to enroll in addition two legions with the regular numbers of infantry and cavalry and to call upon the allies for ten thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry. The levy was more difficult for the consuls because the plague which had attacked the cattle the year before had this year turned into a disease which attacked men. Those who were assailed by it did not easily survive the seventh day; those who had survived that length of time suffered from a lingering disease, usually quartan.[1] The slaves especially died; and along all the roads there were piles of their unburied bodies. Libitina[2] sufficed not even for the funerals of free men. The corpses, untouched by dogs and vultures, were consumed by decay; and it was generally observed that neither in this nor in the previous year, in spite of the great mortality of cattle and men, was a vulture seen anywhere. Of official priests, there perished in this epidemic Gnaeus Servilius Caepio, a pontifex, father of the praetor, and Tiberius Sempronius Longus, the son of Tiberius, decemvir in charge of sacrifices, and Publius Aelius Paetus, an augur, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, an augur, Gaius Mamilius Atellus, the curio maximus,[3] and Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus, a pontiff. As pontiffs there were appointed Gaius Sulpicius Galba . . . in the place of Tuditanus.[4] Augurs

[3] The curio maximus was the chief priest of the curiones of the thirty curiae.

[4] The existence of a lacuna is evidenced by the fact that only one new appointment is mentioned while there were two vacancies. Any restoration is a guess.

A.U.C. 580

sunt in Gracchi locum T. Veturius Gracchus Sempronianus, in P. Aeli,[1] Q. Aelius Paetus. Decemvir sacrorum C. Sempronius Longus, curio maximus
10 C. Scribonius Curio sufficitur. Cum pestilentiae finis non fieret, senatus decrevit uti decemviri libros
11 Sibyllinos adirent. Ex decreto eorum diem unum supplicatio fuit, et Q. Marcio Philippo verba praeeunte populus in foro votum concepit, si morbus pestilentiaque ex agro Romano emota esset, biduum
12 ferias [2] ac supplicationem se habiturum. In Veienti agro biceps natus puer, et Sinuessae unimanus, et Auximi [3] puella cum dentibus, et arcus interdiu sereno caelo super aedem Saturni in foro Romano
13 intentus, et tres simul soles effulserunt, et faces eadem nocte plures per caelum lapsae sunt, et Lanuvini [4] Caeritesque anguem in oppido suo iubatum, flavis [5] maculis sparsum, apparuisse affirmabant, et in agro Campano bovem locutum esse satis constabat.

XXII. Legati nonis Iuniis [6] ex Africa redierunt, qui convento prius Masinissa rege Carthaginem

[1] in P. Aelii Fr.: inpelli V.
[2] ferias Fr.: fvrias V.
[3] et Auximi Cluver: oximi V, cuius margo f. 12 abscinditur, qua de causa multas parvas lacunas suppl. Fr., quam ego secutus sum.
[4] Lanuvini Sigonius: inlanvino V.
[5] flavis Weissenborn: avis V.
[6] nonis Iuniis Sigonius: ix.mil. V.

---

[1] The name is peculiar and the cognomen Gracchus may be a scribe's repetition of the same word just preceding.
[2] Almost all the names above are partially restorations and therefore uncertain. Details are not fully reported in the critical notes.
[3] Cf., e.g. XXXI. xii. 9.

were chosen in the stead of Gracchus—Titus Veturius Gracchus Sempronianus[1] and, to replace Publius Aelius, Quintus Aelius Paetus. As decemvir in charge of sacrifices Gaius Sempronius Longus and as curio maximus Gaius Scribonius Curio[2] were chosen. Since the pestilence would not come to an end, the senate decreed that the decemvirs should consult the Sibylline Books.[3] In accordance with their decree a day of prayer was observed, and as Quintus Marcius Philippus[4] dictated the formula, the people, assembled in the Forum, undertook a vow that if the disease and plague should have been banished from Roman territory they would celebrate a festival and thanksgiving for two days. In the territory of Veii a boy with two heads was born, and at Sinuessa a boy with one hand, and at Auximum a girl with teeth; and a rainbow by day in a clear sky was seen extending over the temple of Saturn in the Forum Romanum, and three suns shone at once, and that same night numerous firebrands glided through the sky, and the people of Lanuvium and Caere asserted that a crested serpent dotted with yellow spots had appeared in their towns, and in the Campanian land there was ample evidence that a cow had spoken. B.C. 174

XXII. On the Nones of June the ambassadors returned from Africa[5] who, after first interviewing King Masinissa, had gone to Carthage; but they

[4] He was a pontifex (XL. xlii. 12), but it is not known why he was selected for this particular task.

[5] The sending of this embassy has not been mentioned, and it clearly had nothing to do with the boundary dispute of XL. xvii. The emendation which gives the exact date of the return of the embassy may well be wrong.

A.U.C. 580

ierant; ceterum certius aliquanto quae Carthagine acta essent, ab rege scierant quam ab ipsis Carthaginiensibus. Compertum tamen affirmaverunt legatos ab rege Perseo venisse, iisque noctu senatum in aede Aesculapi datum esse. Ab Carthagine legatos in Macedoniam missos et rex affirmaverat et ipsi parum constanter negaverant. In Macedoniam quoque mittendos legatos senatus censuit. Tres missi sunt, C. Laelius, M. Valerius Messalla, Sex. Digitius.

Perseus per id tempus, quia quidam Dolopum non parebant et de quibus ambigebatur rebus disceptationem ab rege ad Romanos revocabant, cum exercitu profectus sub ius iudiciumque suum totam coegit gentem. Inde per Oetaeos montes transgressus, religionibus quibusdam animo obiectis, oraculum [1] aditurus Delphos ascendit. Cum in media repente Graecia apparuisset, magnum non finitimis modo urbibus terrorem praebuit, sed [2] in Asiam quoque ad regem Eumenen nuntios tumultuosos [3] misit. Triduum non plus Delphis moratus, per Phthiotidem

[1] oraculum Fr.: oracivm V.
[2] praebuit sed Fr.: praebvisset V.
[3] tumultuosos Hertz: tvmvltvo V: vid. quae dixi de et Auximi, xxi. 12.

---

[1] Livy here turns to affairs in the east and follows Polybius as his source.

[2] The Dolopians had been liberated in 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxxiv. 6), reconquered by Philip with Roman consent in 191 B.C. (XXXVI. xxxiii. 7), while their status after the settlement of 185 B.C. (XXXIX. xxvi. 14) was somewhat uncertain. Perseus obviously claimed some sort of authority over them, and from XLII. xli. 14 it would seem that their "disobedience" amounted to actual revolt. In 185 B.C. Rome had ordered had received much more accurate information as to what had been going on in Carthage from the king than from the Carthaginians themselves. Nevertheless they reported it as an ascertained fact that ambassadors had come from King Perseus and had been given an audience by night before the senate, assembled in the temple of Aesculapius. The king, moreover, had asserted that envoys had been sent from Carthage to Macedonia, and the Carthaginians had denied this without very much firmness. The senate decreed that ambassadors should also be sent to Macedonia. Three were dispatched, Gaius Laelius, Marcus Valerius Messalla, and Sextus Digitius. B.C. 174

Perseus[1] about this time, because certain of the Dolopians[2] were insubordinate and wanted to refer the arbitration of the matters which were in dispute to the Romans instead of to the king, setting out with his army brought the whole district under his sovereignty and sway. Thence, crossing over the Oetaean mountains, since certain religious difficulties beset his mind, he climbed up to Delphi to consult the oracle. When he had suddenly appeared in the midst of Greece, he not merely roused great terror in the neighbouring cities but even caused the dispatch of excited messages to King Eumenes in Asia.[3] Having tarried in Delphi not more than three days, he returned through Phthiotic Achaea

Philip to stay inside the ancient boundaries of Macedonia, and the conduct of Perseus now is in fact, if not literally, a defiance of Rome.

[3] I take the liberty of translating misit thus rather than venture on further emendation, since the loss of text in V is small.

A.U.C. 580

Achaiam Thessaliamque sine damno iniuriaque eorum, per quorum fines [1] iter fecit, in regnum rediit. 7 Nec earum tantum civitatium per quas iturus erat satis habuit animos sibi conciliare; aut legatos aut litteras dimisit, petens, ne diutius simultatum quae cum patre suo fuissent meminissent; nec enim tam atroces fuisse eas, ut non cum ipso potuerint ac 8 debuerint finiri; secum quidem omnia illis integra esse ad [2] instituendam fideliter amicitiam; cum Achaeorum maxime gente reconciliandae gratiae viam quaerebat.

XXIII. Haec una ex omni Graecia gens et Atheniensium civitas eo processerat irarum, ut 2 finibus interdiceret Macedonibus. Itaque servitiis ex Achaia fugientibus receptaculum Macedonia erat, quia, cum finibus suis iis [3] interdixissent, intrare 3 regni terminos ipsi non audebant. Id cum Perseus animadvertisset, comprensis omnibus litterae. . . .[4] Ceterum ne similis fuga servorum postea fieret, 4 cogitandum et illis esse. Recitatis his litteris per Xenarchum praetorem, qui privatae gratiae aditum

[1] eorum per quorum fines Madvig: vmperqvorvm V.
[2] ad add. Fr.
[3] iis add. Perizonius.
[4] lacunam indicavit Fr.

[1] The tense would indicate that these negotiations had preceded his visit to Delphi, but this conclusion seems to be contradicted by the account in sect. 5 of the effect actually produced on the Greeks. Perhaps something has been lost from the text to indicate that Perseus was planning to unite all Greece against the Romans.

[2] The corresponding portion of Polybius is lost, and we have no confirmation of this statement regarding the Achaeans. For Athens, Livy may have in mind the violent anti-Macedonian legislation of 200 B.C. (XXXI. xliv).

and Thessaly to his kingdom without doing any damage or injury to those through whose lands he marched. Nor was he content with winning the good will of only those states through which he was planning to march;[1] he sent out either ambassadors or letters, asking that they should no longer remember the quarrels in which they had engaged with his father; for, he said, they had not been so serious that they could not and should not be ended with him; so far as he was concerned at least, everything was in order for a faithful establishment of friendly relations with them; with the people of the Achaeans especially he was seeking for a way of restoring good feeling. B.C. 174

XXIII. This one people out of all Greece, together with the Athenian state, had gone so far in their anger as to exclude Macedonians from their territories.[2] And so when slaves escaped from Achaea Macedonia was a refuge for them because, since the Achaeans had forbidden the Macedonians to enter their country, they themselves did not dare to cross the frontiers of their kingdom. Accordingly, when Perseus had become aware of this, he arrested all the fugitives [and sent letters graciously promising to restore such slaves to them].[3] But, he added, they too should take measures that similar escapes of slaves should not happen in future. When this letter was read by their general Xenarchus, who was seeking for an opportunity to curry favour personally

[3] I have rendered in a somewhat abbreviated form the thought which Sigonius reconstructed on the strength of the indications contained in sect. 4 and 15 below, but have not ventured to insert in the text the Latin of his conjectural restoration.

A.U.C. 580

apud regem quaerebat, et plerisque moderate et benigne scriptas esse censentibus litteras, atque iis maxime, qui praeter spem recepturi essent amissa
5 mancipia, Callicrates ex iis, qui in eo verti salutem gentis crederent, si cum Romanis inviolatum foedus servaretur
6 "Parva" inquit "aut mediocris res, Achaei, quibusdam videtur agi: ego maxime gravissimam omnium[1] non agi tantum arbitror sed quodam modo actam esse. Nam qui regibus Macedonum Macedonibusque ipsis finibus interdixissemus manereque id decretum sciremus, quo caveramus,[2]
7 scilicet ne legatos, ne nuntios admitteremus regum, per quos aliquorum ex nobis animi sollicitarentur, ii contionantem quodam modo absentem audimus regem, et, si dis placet, orationem eius probamus.
8 Et cum ferae bestiae cibum ad fraudem suam positum plerumque aspernentur et refugiant, nos caeci specie parvi beneficii inescamur et servulorum minimi pretii recipiendorum spe nostram ipsorum libertatem subrui
9 et temptari[3] patimur. Quis enim non videt viam regiae societatis quaeri, qua Romanum foedus, quo[4] nostra omnia continentur, violetur? Nisi hoc dubium alicui est, bellandum Romanis cum Perseo esse et, quod vivo Philippo expectatum, morte eius

[1] omnium Fr.: omnivmqve V.
[2] sciremus, quo caveramus add. Vahlen.
[3] tentari Fr.: temptare V.
[4] quo Fr.: qva V.

---

[1] It is not certain how many cities again had pro-Macedonian parties, but it is reasonable to believe that the anti-Roman sentiment had thus crystallized.

Xenarchus was strategus in 175–174 B.C., and these events probably belong somewhat earlier than Livy represents them.

with the king, and when the majority believed that B.C. 174 it had been written in a spirit of moderation and kindliness, this being especially the view of those who were to recover, contrary to expectations, their lost slaves, Callicrates, one of those who believed that the safety of the state depended on whether the treaty with the Romans were preserved inviolate,[1] spoke as follows:

"The matter under discussion, Achaeans, appears to some to be trivial or of only moderate importance, but I for my part consider that a question by far the most serious of all is not only being decided, but somehow or other has been decided. For we who had forbidden to the kings of the Macedonians and to the Macedonians themselves admission to our territories and who knew that the decree was still in force, namely that by which we had made provision that we should not receive the ambassadors or the messengers of the kings, through whom the sentiments of some of us might be affected, we, I say, are now listening to the king who, so to say, speaks to us though absent, and (heaven help us!) we even approve his speech. And while wild beasts generally disdain and refuse food offered to entrap them, we, blind fools, are caught by the showy bait of a trifling kindness, and, in the hope of recovering some paltry slaves of the slightest value, permit our very liberty to be undermined and endangered. For who does not see that a way for an alliance with the king is being sought, whereby the Roman treaty, on which our whole fate depends, would be violated? Or is it doubtful to anybody that a war between the Romans and Perseus is inevitable, and that this war, anticipated while Philip was alive and postponed by

A.U.C. 580 interpellatum est, id post mortem Philippi futurum.
10 Duos ut scitis habuit filios Philippus, Demetrium et Persea. Genere materno, virtute, ingenio, favore
11 Macedonum longe praestitit Demetrius. Sed quia in Romanos odii regnum posuerat praemium, Demetrium nullo alio crimine quam Romanae amicitiae initae occidit; Persea, quem belli cum[1] populo Romano prius paene quam regni heredem futurum
12 sciebat, regem fecit. Itaque quid hic post mortem patris egit aliud quam bellum paravit? Bastarnas primum ad terrorem omnium in[2] Dardaniam immisit; qui si sedem eam tenuissent, graviores eos accolas
13 Graecia habuisset quam Asia Gallos habebat.[3] Ea spe depulsus non tamen belli consilia omisit; immo, si vere volumus dicere, iam incohavit bellum. Dolopiam armis subegit nec provocantes[4] de controversiis ad disceptationem populi Romani audivit. Inde transgressus Oetam, ut repente in medio umbilico Graeciae conspiceretur, Delphos ascendit.
14 Haec usurpatio itineris insoliti quo vobis spectare videtur? Thessaliam deinde peragravit; quod sine ullius eorum quos oderat noxa,[5] hoc magis tempta-
15 tionem metuo. Inde litteras ad nos cum muneris specie misit et cogitare iubet, quo modo in reliquum hoc munere non egeamus, hoc est, ut decretum,

[1] belli cum add. Madvig.
[2] in add. J. F. Gronovius.
[3] habebat Weissenborn: habeat V.
[4] provocantes J. F. Gronovius: provinciis V.
[5] noxa Duker: noxia V.

[1] The picture of Demetrius is in general consistent with that presented in earlier books.

his death, will come after the death of Philip? As you know, Philip had two sons, Demetrius and Perseus. In birth on his mother's side, in character, in intellect, in influence with the Macedonians, Demetrius far surpassed the other.[1] But because Philip had set up the throne as a prize for hatred of the Romans, he put Demetrius to death, for no other crime than that he had cultivated the friendship of the Romans; Perseus he made king, knowing that he would inherit a war with the Roman people almost before he could inherit the throne. Accordingly, what has he done after his father's death except prepare for war? First, to the alarm of all, he turned the Bastarnae loose into Dardania, and if they had retained this district Greece would have found them neighbours more dangerous than Asia found the Gauls.[2] Disappointed in that hope, he nevertheless did not abandon his plans for the war; no: if we are willing to speak frankly, he has already begun the war. Dolopia he has overrun with arms, and when they wished to appeal in their disputes to the arbitrament of the Roman people he paid no heed.[3] Next, crossing Oeta, so that he suddenly appeared at the very navel of Greece, he climbed up to Delphi. Toward what, do you think, does this assumption of the right to travel an unaccustomed route tend? Then he traversed Thessaly; but if he did so without injuring in any way men whom he hated, all the more do I fear his scheming. Next he directed a letter to us, under pretence of doing us a service, and bids us consider how we shall not need this service in future, that is, that we shall repeal the B.C. 174

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. xlvii. 11.
[2] Cf. xxii. 4 and note above.

A.U.C. 580

16 quo arcentur Peloponneso Macedones, tollamus, rursus legatos regios et hospitia cum principibus et mox Macedonum exercitus, ipsum quoque a Delphis (quantum enim interfluit fretum?)[1] traicientem in Peloponnesum videamus, immisceamur[2] Macedoni-
17 bus armantibus se adversus Romanos. Ego nihil novi censeo decernendum servandaque omnia integra donec ad certum redigatur[3] vanusne hic timor noster
18 an verus fuerit. Si pax inviolata inter Macedonas Romanosque manebit, nobis quoque amicitia et commercium sit; nunc de eo cogitare[4] periculosum et immaturum videtur."

XXIV. Post hunc Archo, frater Xenarchi praetoris, ita disseruit: "Difficilem orationem Callicrates et
2 mihi et omnibus qui ab eo dissentimus fecit: agendo enim Romanae societatis causam ipse temptarique et oppugnari dicendo, quam nemo neque temptat neque oppugnat, effecit[5] ut qui ab se dissentiret
3 adversus Romanos dicere videretur. Ac primum omnium, tamquam non hic nobiscum fuisset, sed aut ex curia populi Romani veniret aut[6] regum arcanis interesset, omnia scit et nuntiat quae occulte facta
4 sunt. Divinat etiam quae futura fuerint,[7] si Philippus vixisset, quid ita Perseus regni heres sit, quid

[1] interfluit fretum Kreyssig: interfvitfretvs V.
[2] immisceamur Sigonius: immiscemvr V.
[3] redigatur J. F. Gronovius: dirigantvr V.
[4] cogitare add. Fr.
[5] effecit Fr.: efficit V.
[6] aut Fr.: avtcvriam V.
[7] fuerint J. F. Gronovius: fverant V.

decree by which Macedonians are excluded from the B.C. 174
Peloponnesus, and again see the king's ambassadors, and hospitalities exchanged with their leaders, and presently Macedonian armies and even the king himself crossing from Delphi (for how great a strait flows between us?[1]) to the Peloponnesus, and shall be mingled with the Macedonians as they arm themselves against the Romans! I vote that we shall decree nothing new but preserve everything as it is, until it shall be reduced to certainty whether our fears are false or justified. If the peace between the Macedonians and the Romans remains inviolate, let us too share the friendship and the intercourse; to plan about it now seems dangerous and premature."

XXIV. After him Archo, brother of the general Xenarchus, spoke as follows: "Difficult indeed has Callicrates made the task of speaking for me and for all of us who disagree with him; for by pleading the cause of the Roman alliance he himself, by alleging that it is being endangered and attacked, although no one is either endangering or attacking it, has brought it to pass that whoever should disagree with him would seem to be speaking against the Romans. And first of all, just as if he had not been here with us, but were either coming from the senate-house of the Roman people or were a sharer in the secrets of kings, he knows everything and reports everything which has been done in concealment. He even foretells what would have happened if Philip had lived, why Perseus became heir to the throne in such a parent Macedones, quid cogitent Romani. Nos autem, qui nec ob quam causam nec quem ad modum perierit Demetrius scimus, nec quid Philippus si vixisset facturus fuerit,[1] ad haec, quae palam geruntur, consilia nostra accommodare oportet. Ac scimus Persea regno accepto regem a populo Romano appellatum; audimus legatos Romanos venisse ad regem Persea[2] et eos benigne exceptos. Haec omnia pacis equidem signa esse iudico non belli; nec Romanos offendi posse si ut bellum gerentes eos secuti sumus, nunc quoque pacis auctores sequamur. Cur quidem nos inexpiabile omnium soli bellum adversus regnum Macedonum geramus, non video. Opportuni[3] propinquitate ipsa Macedoniae sumus? An infirmissimi omnium, tamquam, quos nuper subegit,[4] Dolopes? Immo contra ea vel viribus nostris, deum benignitate, vel regionis intervallo tuti. Sed simus[5] aeque subiecti ac Thessali Aetolique: nihilo plus fidei auctoritatisque habemus adversus Romanos, qui semper socii atque amici fuimus, quam Aetoli, qui paulo ante hostes fuerunt? Quod Aetolis, quod Thessalis, quod Epirotis, omni denique Graeciae cum Macedonibus iuris est, idem et nobis sit. Cur execrabilis ista nobis solis velut[6] dissertio iuris

[1] The Corinthian Gulf between Cape Rhion on the south and across to Cape Antirrhion on the north is only one and a half miles wide.

A.U.C. 580

[1] fuerit Sigonius: fverat V.

[2] regno accepto etc. usque ad ad regem Persea Fr.: ac regno accepto a populo Romano audimus legatos Romanos venisse ad regem Persea Kreyssig: acceptoalegatosromanosvenisseadregemperseaadpr (sic) appellatvm V.

[3] opportuni Fr.: opportvnitate V.

[4] subegit Kreyssig: svbiecit V.

way, what preparations the Macedonians are making, B.C. 174 what the Romans are considering. But we who know neither for what reason or in what manner Demetrius died nor what Philip would have done if he had lived, ought to adjust our decision to those events which are taking place in full view. And we do know that Perseus, having gained the throne, was saluted as king by the Roman people: we hear that Roman ambassadors came to King Perseus and that they were courteously received. All these things I, for my part, interpret as signs of peace, not war; nor can the Romans be offended if, as we followed them in waging war, we now follow them likewise as sponsors of peace. Why indeed we, alone of men, should wage unrelenting war against the Kingdom of the Macedonians, I do not see. Are we vulnerable because of our very proximity to Macedonia? Or are we, like the Dolopians whom he has just subdued, the weakest of all mortals? No, on the contrary, by the grace of the gods, either our own strength or the distance which separates us makes us secure. Grant that we are as much at the mercy of the king as the Thessalians, and the Aetolians; have we no more credit and standing in the eyes of the Romans, we who have always been their allies and friends, than the Aetolians, who but a short time ago were their enemies? Whatever rights exist between the Macedonians and the Aetolians, the Thessalians, the Epirotes, in a word, all Greece, let us also possess. Why should we alone experience that accursed loosen-

[5] simus Walch: svmvs V.

[6] idem et nobis sit. Cur execrabilis ista nobis solis velut Fr.: idemetnobissitcvmexecrabilisistanobissitcvrexecrabilisistanobissolis V.

A.U.C. 580

11 humani est? Fecerit aliquid Philippus cur adversus eum armatum et bellum gerentem hoc decerneremus; quid Perseus, novus rex, omnis iniuriae insons, suo beneficio paternas simultates obliterans, meruit,
12 cur soli omnium hostes ei simus?[1] Quamquam et illud dicere poteram, tanta priorum Macedoniae regum merita erga nos fuisse, ut Philippi unius iniurias, si quae forte fuerunt, utique post mortem
13 obliterent. Non venit in mentem,[2] cum classis Romana Cenchreis staret,[3] consul cum exercitu Elatiae esset, triduum nos in concilio fuisse consultantes
14 utrum Romanos an Philippum sequeremur? Nihil metus praesens ab Romanis sententias nostras inclinarit: fuit certe tamen aliquid, quod tam longam deliberationem faceret;[4] idque[5] erat vetusta coniunctio cum Macedonibus, vetera et magna in 15 nos regum merita. Valeant et nunc eadem illa, non ut praecipue amici, sed ne praecipue inimici simus. Ne id, quod non agitur, Callicrates, simulaverimus agi. Nemo novae societatis aut novi foederis, quo
16 nos temere illigemus, conscribendi est auctor; sed commercium tantum iuris praebendi repetendique sit, ne interdictione finium nostrorum nos quoque terminis regni[6] arceamus; ne servis nostris aliquo fugere liceat—quid hoc adversus Romana foedera

[1] simus J. F. Gronovius: svmvs V.
[2] obliterent non venit in mentem add. Wesenberg.
[3] Cenchreis staret Sigonius: cencristaberet (sic) V.
[4] faceret ed. Vascosana: fecerat V.
[5] idque Hartel: idqvod V.
[6] nostrorum nos quoque terminis regni Vahlen: nostrosqvvqveetnossegni V.

[1] Cf. XXXII. xix–xxiii.

ing, so to speak, of human ties? Assume that Philip has done something for which we should pass this decree against him when he was armed and waging war; what has Perseus deserved, a new king, innocent of all wrong, who now wipes out by his kindness the memory of his father's quarrels, that we alone of all men should be his enemies? And yet I might have said even this, that so great were the benefits conferred upon us by former kings of Macedonia that they, especially now that he is dead, wipe out the memory of wrongs committed by Philip alone, if perchance there were such. Does it not come to mind that when the Roman fleet lay at Cenchreae and the consul with his army was at Elatia, we spent three days in the council deliberating whether we should follow the Romans or Philip?[1] Grant that no immediate fear of the Romans affected our judgment: there was certainly something, nevertheless, which caused so long consideration; and this was our long-standing association with the Macedonians and the ancient and great services rendered us by their kings. Let the ancient arguments prevail even now, not to make us conspicuously their friends, but to prevent our being conspicuously their enemies. Let us not pretend, Callicrates, that the question is being settled which is not being settled. No one counsels us to make a new alliance or conclude a new treaty by which we may without knowing it entangle ourselves in difficulties; only intercourse of proffering and receiving justice, and that we shall not exclude ourselves from the territory of the kingdom by barring our frontiers to them; that it may not be permitted our slaves to flee anywhere—how is that against the Roman treaties? B.C. 174

A.U.C 580

17 est? Quid rem parvam et apertam magnam et suspectam facimus? Quid vanos tumultus ciemus?
18 Quid, ut ipsi locum adsentandi Romanis habeamus, suspectos alios et invisos efficimus?[1] Si bellum erit,[2] ne Perseus quidem dubitat quin Romanos secuturi simus;[3] in pace, etiam si non odia[4] finiuntur, intermittantur."
19 Cum iidem huic orationi qui litteris regis assensi erant assentirentur, indignatione principum, quod, quam rem ne legatione quidem dignam iudicasset Perseus, litteris paucorum versuum impetraret,[5]
20 decretum differtur. Legati deinde postea missi ab rege, cum Megalopoli concilium esset, dataque opera est ab iis, qui offensionem apud Romanos timebant, ne admitterentur.

XXV. Per haec tempora Aetolorum in semet ipsos versus furor mutuis caedibus ad internecionem adduc-
2 turus videbatur gentem. Fessi deinde et Romam utraque pars miserunt legatos et inter se ipsi de reconcilianda concordia agebant; quae novo facinore
3 discussa res veteres etiam iras excitavit. Exulibus Hypataeis, qui factionis Proxeni[6] erant, cum reditus in patriam promissus esset fidesque data per principem
4 civitatis Eupolemum, octoginta illustres homines, quibus redeuntibus inter ceteram multitudinem Eupolemus etiam obvius exierat, cum salutatione

[1] et invisos efficimus Heraeus: invisosvfficimvs V.
[2] erit Fr.: erat V.
[3] simus Fr.: svmvs V.
[4] odia Fr.: odio V.
[5] impetraret J. F. Gronovius: imperaret V.
[6] Proxeni Fr.: proximi V.

Why do we turn a slight and open matter into one B.C. 174 that is important and suspicious? Why do we stir up groundless alarms? Why, in order that we may have an opportunity to flatter the Romans, do we bring others under suspicion and distrust? If there is to be war not even Perseus doubts that we will follow the Romans; in peace, even if hatreds are not ended, let them be suspended."

When the same persons who had applauded the king's letter applauded this speech, on account of the indignation of the chiefs, that what Perseus did not deem deserving even of an embassy he should secure by means of a letter a few lines long, the decree was deferred. Later on ambassadors were sent by the king, at the time when the council was meeting at Megalopolis, and precautions were taken by the party which feared that the Romans would take offence, that they should not be received.

XXV. At this time the rage of the Aetolians, being turned upon themselves, seemed likely, as they murdered one another, to bring the whole people to extermination. Then, as they grew wearied, each faction sent ambassadors to Rome, and of their own accord negotiated with one another regarding the restoration of harmony; this effort, broken up by a new crime, reawakened the old passions. When exiles from Hypata, who belonged to the party of Proxenus, had been promised restoration to their city and a public safeguard had been promised them by Eupolemus,[1] the chief of the city, eighty distinguished men, whom Eupolemus with the rest of the population had even gone out to meet on [1] Eupolemus was strategus in 176–175 B.C., and the trouble may have occurred then, not in 174 B.C., when Livy reports it.

A.U.C. 580

benigna excepti essent dextraeque datae, ingredientes portam, fidem datam deosque testis nequiquam invocantes [1] interfecti sunt. Inde gravius de integro
5 bellum exarsit. C. Valerius Laevinus et Ap. Claudius Pulcher et C. Memmius et M. Popilius et L. Canuleius
6 missi ab senatu venerant. Apud eos cum Delphis utriusque partis legati magno certamine agerent,[2] Proxenus maxime cum causa tum eloquentia praestare visus est; qui paucos post dies ab Orthobula uxore veneno est sublatus; damnataque eo crimine
7 in exilium abiit. Idem furor et Cretenses lacerabat. Adventu deinde Q. Minuci legati, qui cum decem navibus missus ad sedanda eorum certamina erat, ad [3] spem pacis venerant. Ceterum indutiae tantum sex mensum fuerunt; inde multo gravius bellum
8 exarsit. Lycii quoque per idem tempus ab Rhodiis bello vexabantur. Sed externorum inter se bella, quo quaeque modo gesta sint,[4] persequi non operae est satis superque oneris sustinenti res a populo Romano gestas perscribere.[5]

XXVI. Celtiberi in Hispania, qui bello domiti se Ti. Graccho dediderant, pacati manserant M.

[1] invocantes Fr.: vocantes V.
[2] agerent Curio: egervnt V.
[3] ad add. Hertz.
[4] sint Wesenberg: svnt V.
[5] perscribere Harant: resscribere V.

---

[1] The relation of the embassy mentioned in xxii. 3 above to this is unknown.

[2] Livy's vagueness in relating these events probably indicates a lack of actual knowledge of them. He seems to see no connection even between the last war mentioned and the Lycian embassy which he reported at vi. 8–12 above.

their return, although they were received with B.C. 174 courteous addresses and hand-clasps, as they entered the gate appealing in vain to the assurances of safety given and to the gods, were slain. In consequence of this a more serious war flared up afresh. Gaius Valerius Laevinus, Appius Claudius Pulcher, Gaius Memmius, Marcus Popilius, and Lucius Canuleius, sent by the senate, had arrived.[1] When representatives of both factions spoke before them at Delphi with great contentiousness, Proxenus seemed to outstrip the rest, both in the merit of his cause and in eloquence; a few days later he was poisoned by his wife Orthobula; and she being condemned on that charge, went into exile. The same madness rent the Cretans too. The arrival of Quintus Minucius the commissioner, who had been sent with ten ships to quell their contentions, then brought them to the hope of peace. But the truce was for six months only; then a much more serious war flared up. The Lycians also at this time were being harassed in war by the Rhodians. But the wars which foreign nations waged among themselves and the manner in which they were conducted, it is not worth while to relate in detail, since I carry enough and too much of a burden in describing in full the achievements of the Roman people.[2]

XXVI. The Celtiberians in Spain, who had surrendered to Tiberius Gracchus[3] after their defeat in the war, had remained quiet while Marcus Titinius[4]

[3] Gracchus went to Spain in 179 B.C. (XL. xlvii. 1); his return and triumph in 177 B.C. were reported at vi. 4 and vii. 2 above.

[4] Titinius was one of the unnamed praetors for 178 B.C. (XL. ix. 5).

A.U.C. 580

Titinio praetore obtinente[1] provinciam. Rebellarunt sub adventum Ap. Claudi orsique bellum sunt ab repentina oppugnatione castrorum Romanorum. 2 Prima lux ferme erat, cum vigiles in vallo quique in portarum stationibus erant, cum vidissent procul 3 venientem hostem, ad arma conclamaverunt. Ap. Claudius, signo proposito pugnae ac paucis adhortatus milites, tribus simul portis eduxit. Obsistentibus ad exitum Celtiberis primo par utrimque proelium fuit, quia propter angustias non omnes in faucibus 4 pugnare poterant Romani; urguentes deinde alii alios secuti ubi[2] evaserunt extra vallum, ut pandere aciem et exaequari cornibus hostium[3] quibus circumibantur possent ita repente inruperunt ut sustinere 5 impetum eorum Celtiberi nequirent. Ante horam secundam pulsi sunt; ad quindecim milia caesa aut[4] capta, signa adempta duo et triginta. Castra etiam eo die expugnata debellatumque; nam qui superfuere proelio, in oppida sua dilapsi sunt. Quieti deinde paruerunt imperio.

XXVII. Censores eo anno creati Q. Fulvius Flaccus et A. Postumius Albinus legerunt senatum; princeps lectus M. Aemilius Lepidus pontifex maximus. 2 De senatu novem eiecerunt; insignes notae fuerunt M. Corneli Maluginensis, qui biennio[5] ante praetor

[1] obtinente Fr.: oppvgnante V.
[2] ubi add. Weissenborn.
[3] hostium J. F. Gronovius: hostibvs V.
[4] caesa aut add. Fr.
[5] biennio Fr.: sibiennio V.

held the province as praetor. They rebelled on the arrival of Appius Claudius [1] and began the war by a surprise attack on the Roman camp. It was about daybreak, when the sentinels were on the rampart and the outposts were on guard at the gates, that they saw the enemy coming afar off and called the troops to arms. Appius Claudius, after displaying the signal for battle and briefly exhorting the troops, led them out by three gates at once. The Celtiberians met them as they came out, and at first there was a drawn battle, since on account of the narrow space not all the Romans could fight in the entrance; then, as they pressed forward one on another, when they had forced their way out beyond the rampart in order that they might extend their line and form it to meet the flanks of the enemy by which they were being surrounded, they burst out so suddenly that the Celtiberians were unable to withstand the charge. Before the second hour they were repulsed; about fifteen thousand were killed or captured, and thirty-two standards were taken. The camp was also captured that day and the war was over: for those who survived the battle scattered to their towns. Thereafter they quietly submitted to authority. B.C. 174

XXVII. The censors who were elected that year, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Aulus Postumius Albinus, chose the members of the senate; as princeps senatus Marcus Aemilius Lepidus the chief pontiff was chosen. They expelled nine from the senate. The conspicuous victims of the censure were Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis, who

[1] The election of Claudius as praetor in 175 B.C. was presumably recorded in the lost text of chap. xviii.

A.U.C. 580

in Hispania fuerat, et L. Corneli Scipionis praetoris, cuius tum inter cives et peregrinos iurisdictio erat, et L. Fulvi, qui frater germanus et, ut Valerius Antias 3 tradit, consors etiam censoris [1] erat. Consules votis in [2] Capitolio nuncupatis in provincias profecti sunt. Ex iis M. Aemilio senatus negotium dedit ut Patavinorum in Venetia seditionem comprimeret, quos certamine factionum ad intestinum bellum exarsisse 4 et ipsorum legati attulerant. Legati, qui in Aetoliam ad similes motus comprimendos ierant, renuntiarunt coerceri rabiem gentis non posse. Patavinis saluti fuit adventus consulis; neque aliud quod ageret [3] 5 in provincia cum habuisset, Romam redit. Censores vias sternendas silice in urbe, glarea extra urbem substruendas marginandasque primi omnium lo-

[1] censoris Fr.: consortis V.
[2] votis in Crévier: votisetiametiamin V.
[3] ageret Fr.: agere V.

---

[1] In xv. 10 above Cornelius is represented as having evaded going to Spain, and Livy or a scribe, forgetting the fact, assumed that he had actually gone. Possibly his expulsion from the senate was due to suspicion or certainty that he had perjured himself; possibly it was due to an anti-Scipionic crusade: see also the next note.

[2] In viii. 1 Livy reported the election of Cn. Cornelius Scipio as praetor for 177 B.C. Valerius Maximus (IV. v. 3) has an anecdote of the election of Cn. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Africanus, and speaks of him as holding a judicial assignment, whereas the praetor of 177 B.C. was in Gaul. It is therefore impossible to be certain which, if either, was the son of Africanus. The basis for the expulsion of this Scipio is unknown. His election was mentioned in the lost portion of chap. xx.

two years before had been praetor in Spain,[1] and B.C. 174
Lucius Cornelius Scipio the praetor, who at the time exercised jurisdiction over cases between citizens and aliens,[2] and Lucius Fulvius who was own brother to the censor and, as Valerius Antias writes, held their father's property jointly with the censor.[3] The consuls, after publicly proclaiming their vows on the Capitoline, departed to their provinces. To one of them, Marcus Aemilius,[4] the senate had entrusted the task of suppressing a revolt of the people of Patavium in Venetia, since even their own ambassadors had reported that civil war had flared up in consequence of the rivalry of factions. The ambassasors who had gone to Aetolia to repress similar disturbances reported that the madness of the people could not be checked. The consul's arrival was the cause of safety to the people of Patavium; since he had nothing else to do in the province, he returned to Rome. The censors first of all let contracts for paving the streets in the City with flint,[5] and for laying the bases of roads outside the City with gravel and constructing footpaths along

[3] The censor of this year was consul in 179 B.C. (a cousin of the same name was consul in 180 B.C.). Each of them seems to have had a brother Marcus, the brother of the consul of 180 B.C. perhaps having the cognomen Nobilior (XL. xli. 7–10 and the note). Possibly, however, Nobilior, who was banished in 180 B.C., is the man who is here referred to with the praenomen Lucius; he may have been expelled from the senate in 175 B.C. (XL. li. 1). Velleius (I. x. 6) calls him Fulvius Gnaeus, while Valerius Maximus (II. vii. 5) mentions him without the praenomen.

[4] Aemilius was consul in 175 B.C. not in 174 B.C., and Livy is in error as to the name or as to the date.

[5] The first paving outside of Rome was recorded XXXVIII. xxviii. 3; this is the first within the city.

A.U.C. 580

caverunt, pontesque multis locis faciendos; et 6 scaenam [1] aedilibus practoribusque praebendam; et carceres in circo, et ova ad notas [2] curriculis numerandis . . . dam, et metas trans . . . et caveas ferreas, per quas intromitterentur . . . feriis [3] in
7 monte Albano consulibus, et clivum Capitolinum silice sternendum curaverunt, et porticum ab aede Saturni in Capitolium ad senaculum, ac super id
8 curiam. Et extra portam Trigeminam emporium lapide straverunt stipitibusque saepserunt, et porticum Aemiliam reficiendam curarunt, gradibusque 9 ascensum ab Tiberi in emporium fecerunt. Et intra [4] eandem portam in Aventinum porticum silice straverunt, et . . . [5] ab aede Veneris fecerunt.

[1] et scaenam Fr.: etaescenam V.
[2] hic alibique lacunae agnoscuntur, margine cod. abscissa.
[3] feriis Sigonius: ferreis V.
[4] intra Perizonius: extra V.
[5] in V legimus eo publico, sed locus corruptus nondum sanatus est; de cliuo Publicio cogitauit Perizonius; rem integram reliqui.

---

[1] Their location is unknown; no bridges within Rome are traceable to this censorship.

[2] These magistrates presided over games at which dramatic performances were given.

[3] The text of this passage has suffered in various places, and no satisfactory restorations have been proposed for most of the lacunae. I have added nothing to complete the sense except "the wild beasts." The carceres were built at the end of the race-track, so placed as to give each contestant an equal opportunity to gain the inside track. The ova were arranged on the spina, and one was taken down as each lap in the race was run. The metae marked the points around which the chariots were to go. The single syllable dam is entirely unintelligible.

[4] The loss of the context leaves consulibus without a sense, and makes the entire clause doubtful in meaning.

their edges, and for the construction of bridges in many places;[1] also a stage to be placed at the disposal of the aediles and praetors;[2] stalls too in the Circus, and egg-shaped markers to designate the laps . . . and turning-points across . . . and iron cages through which the wild beasts might be let in . . .[3] the festival on the Alban Mount . . .,[4] and they arranged for the pavement with flint of the Clivus Capitolinus[5] and for the construction of a portico from the temple of Saturn to the assembly-room of the senators on the Capitoline,[6] and, above it, to the Curia. And outside the Porta Trigemina they paved the warehouse with stone and enclosed it with paling, and they contracted for repairs to the portico of Aemilius,[7] and built a stairway from the Tiber to the warehouse.[8] And within the same gate they paved with flint the portico leading to the Aventine, and they built . . . from the temple of Venus.[9] The same censors contracted for the con- B.C. 174

[5] This was the steep ascent from the Forum to the Capitoline.

[6] The meaning is uncertain, but would seem to require two porticoes, one following the line of the Clivus Capitolinus, one branching off from it and running northward along the face or at the foot of the Capitoline, and reaching the area occupied by the temple of Concord or the Comitium. Possibly there were a senaculum and a curia.

[7] Cf. XXXV. x. 12; on the Capitoline (for the comitia curiata).

[8] This area lay at the south-west corner of the Aventine, along the Tiber.

[9] If the phrase found in V. eo publico (see the critical note) is derived from the corruption of clivo Publicio, the temple of Vesta might be the one referred to in XXIX. xxxvii. 2 as in the forum boarium, whence the clivus Publicius led to the Aventine.

A.U.C. 580

10 Idem Calatiae et Auximi muros faciendos locaverunt; venditisque ibi publicis locis pecuniam, quae redacta [1] erat, tabernis utrique foro circumdandis consump-
11 serunt. Et alter ex iis Fulvius Flaccus—nam Postumius nihil nisi senatus Romani populive iussu se locaturum edixit [2]—ipsorum pecunia Iovis aedem Pisauri et Fundis et Potentiae etiam aquam adducen-
12 dam, et Pisauri viam silice sternendam, et Sinuessae magalia addenda [3] . . . aviariae in his et cloacas et murum circumducendum . . . et forum porticibus [4] tabernisque claudendum et Ianos tres faciendos.
13 Haec ab uno censore opera locata cum magna gratia colonorum. Moribus quoque regendis diligens et severa censura fuit. Multis equi adempti.

XXVIII. Exitu prope anni diem unum supplicatio fuit ob res prospere gestas in Hispania ductu auspicioque Ap. [5] Claudi proconsulis; et maioribus
2 hostiis viginti sacrificatum. Et alterum diem supplicatio ad Cereris, Liberi Liberaeque fuit, quod ex Sabinis terrae motus ingens cum multis aedificiorum

[1] redacta Fr.: redvcta V.
[2] edixit add. Madvig.
[3] magalia addenda Roth: maca V Vid. quae dixi de notis § 6 supra.
[4] porticibus Fr.: etporticvs V.
[5] Ap. Fr.: apvt V.

---

[1] According to Weissenborn the words Iovis aedem should be construed with both Fundis and Potentiae: cf. XL. xli. 6.

[2] Or possibly "huts," "hutments." magalia and mapalia were Punic words, or the same Punic word, for huts or small dwellings. magalia was also used for the suburbs of Carthage. There may be a connection between magalia here and the word aviariae (which is not here translated); for Cato speaks of struction of walls at Calatia and Auximum; and after B.C. 174 selling the public land there, the money which had been collected they devoted to building shops around the forum in each town. Also one of them, Fulvius Flaccus—for Postumius had announced that he would let no contract without the order of the Roman senate or assembly—with the money allotted to them contracted for a temple of Jupiter at Pisaurum and at Fundi,[1] and for conducting water to Potentia also, and for paving with flint a street at Pisaurum and at Sinuessa for the construction of suburbs[2] . . . in them, for both sewers and a surrounding wall . . . and a forum, to be enclosed by porticoes and shops, and for the erection of three statues of Janus. These contracts were let by the one censor to the great satisfaction of the colonists.[3] In the supervision of morals the censorship was careful and strict. The horses of many were taken away.[4]

XXVIII. At about the end of the year there was a day of thanksgiving on account of the successes in Spain under the leadership and auspices of Appius Claudius the proconsul, and twenty full-grown victims were sacrificed. There was also a second day of prayer at the temples of Ceres, Liber and Libera, because from Sabine territory there came the news of a severe earthquake causing many buildings to

" magalia " as cohortes rotundae, and a cohors is a cattle-pen or a poultry-pen. Cf. Cato in Servius on Virgil Aen. i. 421 (E. H. Warmington).

[3] The colonies were Pisaurum, Potentia, and Sinuessa, and possibly the three statues were erected there.

[4] Cf. XXXIX. xliv. 1 etc. The censorship was particularly active in the construction of new buildings, despite the apparent conservatism of Postumius; see Tenney Frank, An Economic Survey of Ancient Rome, Vol. I. ch. iii. p. 185.

A.U.C. 580

3 ruinis nuntiatus erat. Cum Ap. Claudius ex Hispania Romam redisset, decrevit senatus ut ovans urbem
4 iniret. Iam consularia comitia appetebant; quibus magna contentione habitis propter multitudinem petentium creati L. Postumius Albinus et M. Popilius
5 Laenas. Praetores inde facti N. Fabius Buteo C. Matienus C. Cicereius M. Furius Crassipes iterum A. Atilius Serranus iterum C. Cluvius Saxula iterum.
6 Comitiis perfectis Ap. Claudius Cento ex Celtiberis ovans cum in urbem iniret, decem milia pondo 7 argenti, quinque milia auri in aerarium tulit. Flamen Dialis inauguratus est Cn. Cornelius.
8 Eodem anno tabula in aede Matris Matutae cum indice hoc posita est.: " Ti. Semproni Gracchi consulis imperio auspicioque legio exercitusque populi Romani Sardiniam subegit. In ea provincia hostium
9 caesa aut capta supra octoginta milia. Re publica felicissime gesta atque liberatis sociis,[1] vectigalibus restitutis exercitum salvum atque incolumem plenissimum praeda domum reportavit; iterum triumphans in urbem Romam redit. Cuius rei ergo
10 hanc tabulam donum Iovi dedit." Sardiniae insulae forma erat, atque [2] in ea simulacra pugnarum picta.
11 Munera gladiatorum eo anno aliquot, parva alia,

[1] sociis add. Sigonius.
[2] atque Fr.: avtqve V.

---

[1] Furius was praetor in 187 B.C. (XXXVIII. xlii. 4), Atilius in 192 B.C. (XXXV. x. 11), Cluvius perhaps in 175 B.C., his election having been reported in the lost section of chap. xviii above: at least there is no vacancy in earlier years. In that case the normal interval between terms of the same office was not observed (VII. xlii. 7).

collapse. When Appius Claudius had returned from B.C. 174
Spain to Rome, the senate decreed that he should enter the city in ovation. The consular election was now at hand; when this was held with great contention because of the large number of candidates, Lucius Postumius Albinus and Marcus Popilius Laenas were chosen. Next the praetors were elected, Numerius Fabius Buteo, Gaius Matienus, Gaius Cicereius, Marcus Furius Crassipes, Aulus Atilius Serranus, Gaius Cluvius Saxula (the last three each for the second time).[1] When the elections were over and Appius Claudius Cento entered the City in ovation over the Celtiberians, he deposited in the treasury ten thousand pounds of silver and five thousand of gold. Gnaeus Cornelius was inaugurated as flamen Dialis.

In the same year a tablet was set up in the temple of Mater Matuta with this inscription: "Under the command and auspices of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus the legion and army of the Roman people conquered Sardinia. In this province more than eighty thousand of the enemy were slain or captured.[2] The state having been most successfully administered and the allies set free, the revenues restored, he brought back home the army safe and secure and enriched with booty; for the second time he entered the city of Rome in triumph. In commemoration of this event he set up this tablet to Jupiter." It had the form of the island of Sardinia, and on it representations of battles were painted.

Many gladiatorial games were given that year, some of them unimportant; one was noteworthy

[2] Slaves were the only booty, according to Festus (p. 322), and they became proverbial for their cheapness.

A.U.C. 580

data; unum ante cetera insigne fuit T. Flaminini, quod mortis causa patris sui cum visceratione epuloque et ludis scaenicis quadriduum dedit. Magni tum[1] muneris ea summa fuit quod per triduum quattuor et septuaginta homines pugnarint.

[1] tum Walch: tamen V, fortasse rectius.

---

[1] Nothing is known of the career of the liberator of Greece after his embassy to Prusias in 183 B.C. (XXXIX. li. 1 ff.), and his death may have occurred at this time.

beyond the rest, that of Titus Flaminiuus, which B.C. 174
he gave to commemorate the death of his father,[1] lasted four days, and was accompanied by a public distribution of meats, a banquet and scenic performances. The climax of a show which was big for that time was that in three days seventy-four gladiators fought.[2]

[1] While the number of gladiators was large for the time, it was so small in comparison with later games as to deserve mention.

There is no trace of loss at the end of Book XL, and the account of the Voconian law, mentioned in the Periocha, must have been found in some lost section, if the Periocha is correct.

PERIOCHA LIBRI XLI

IGNIS in aede Vestae extinctus est. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus pro cos. Celtiberos victos in deditionem accepit, monumentumque operum suorum Gracchurim oppidum in Hispania constituit; et a Postumio Albino pro cos. Vaccaei ac Lusitani subacti sunt. Uterque triumphavit. Antiochus, Antiochi filius, obses a patre Romanis datus mortuo fratre Seleuco, qui patri defuncto successerat, in regnum Syriae ab urbe dimissus. Qui praeter religionem, qua multa templa magnifica multis locis erexit,[1] Athenis Iovis Olympii et Antiochiae Capitolini,[2] vilissimum regem

[1] qui praeter . . . regem egit hic e fine periochae transposuit Gronovius, qui qua posuit: quam codd; locis erexit Gronovianus et ed. princeps: sociis cum lacuna codd. alii, recepit, fecit addens, Rossbach, quem alibi secutus sum.

[2] Capitolini add. Sigonius: om. codd.

---

[1] The asterisk indicates that the events described in the following sentence were related in a lost portion of the book.

[2] Another instance of this ominous occurrence is related in XXVIII. xi. 6, and Valerius Maximus I. 1. 6 (206 B.C.); a general discussion of the going out and rekindling of the fire is given by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, II. 66. 3.

[3] Gracchus and Albinus were, strictly speaking, praetors, but Livy uses the term "proconsul" freely for the praetors who governed Spain, cf. XLII. iii. 1 with XLII. x. 5.

[4] The town had existed previously under the name of Ilurcis (Festus Pauli ed. K. O. Müller, p. 97, s.v. Gracchuris). Later it had Latin rights (Pliny, Natural History III. 24)

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLI

[1] *The fire in the temple of Vesta went out.[2] *The proconsul [3] Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus conquered and received the surrender of the Celtiberians, and as a monument to his labours established a town, Gracchuris,[4] in Spain; also the Vaccaei and Lusitanians were subdued by the proconsul Postumius Albinus. Both celebrated triumphs. *Antiochus, son of Antiochus, who had been given to the Romans as a hostage by his father, on the death of his brother Seleucus, who had succeeded as king on their father's decease, was sent back from the City to the throne of Syria.[5] Apart from his piety, because of which he built many grand temples in many places—at Athens, the temple of Jupiter Olympius, and at Antioch, that of Jupiter Capitolinus—he played a very tawdry rôle and coined its own money. Its citizens are mentioned in the Fragment of Bk. XCI, and it also appears in the late geographical works.

[5] This was Antiochus IV Epiphanes, son of Antiochus III the Great (d. 187 B.C.). According to Appian, Syrian Wars ch. viii. 45, he was released from Rome by his brother Seleucus IV, who sent his son Demetrius to replace Antiochus. The ex-hostage spent some time in Athens on his way home, receiving honours and making himself agreeable, particularly in the matter of the temple of Zeus Olympius, begun under Peisistratus and only finished, in spite of the munificence of Antiochus, by Hadrian. At this time Antiochus probably gave the golden aegis with the Gorgon which Pausanias (V. xii. 4) saw above the theatre. Antiochus established himself on the throne in 175 B.C. by driving out a usurper, Heliodorus, who had murdered Seleucus; the kingdom of Pergamum assisted Antiochus at this time.

egit. Lustrum a censoribus conditum est: censa sunt civium capita CCLVIII[1] CCXCIIII. Q. Voconius[2] Saxa tribunus plebis legem tulit, ne quis mulierem heredem institueret. Suasit legem M. Cato. Exstat oratio eius. Praeterea res adversus Liguras et Histros et Sardos et Celtiberos a compluribus ducibus prospere gestas et initia belli Macedonici continet, quod Perseus Philippi filius moliebatur. Miserat ad Carthaginienses legationem, et ab his nocte audita erat. Sed et alias Graeciae civitates sollicitabat.

[1] At ed. princeps CCLXIII CCXCIIII praebet.
[2] Voconius Sigonius: Volonius N.

---

[1] Polybius (XXVI. 1a and 1) seems to have been the source for Livy's description of Antiochus (cf. ch. xx. of this book); Polybius XXVI. 1. 10–11 is closely parallel to this statement of the Periocha.

[2] The figure is variously given in the MSS.; in view of the statement in XLII. x. that the next census figures were "somewhat less" because of the elimination of Latin pretenders to Roman citizenship, I should prefer the larger figure as given in the critical note. Other activities of these censors are described in XL. li–lii.

[3] The first provision of this law seems to have run: "ne quis heredem virginem neve mulierem faceret" (Augustine, De Civitate Dei III. 21) and it applied to those listed in the census as having 100,000 asses or more (Cicero, Second Verrine Oration I, chs. 41–45), although Dio Cassius LVI. 10 gives the sum as 25,000 drachmas = 100,000 sesterces, or twice Cicero's sum, which may have been changed by judicial interpretation in the course of time. The Vestal Virgins were exempt, and might devise as they chose (Cicero, De Republica, III. 10).

as king.[1] *The five-year period was brought to an end by the censors; there were enumerated as citizens 258,294 persons.[2] *Quintus Voconius Saxa, tribune of the people, carried a law that no one should make a woman his heir.[3] *Marcus Cato advocated the law. *His speech survives.[4] Moreover, the book covers successful campaigns by several leaders against the Ligurians, Histrians, Sardinians, and Celtiberians, as well as the beginnings of the Macedonian War, which Perseus, the son of Philip, was pushing forward. He had sent an embassy to the Carthaginians, and it had been heard by them at night. Then too, he kept making overtures to the other states of Greece.

However, legacies might be made to women, and their share, if there was no will, was not limited (Cicero, loc. cit.). The law continued: ne cui plus legatorum nomine mortisve causa capere liceret quam heredes caperent, si plus legarit quam ad heredem heredesve perveniat (Gaius II. 226), i.e., probably no single legatee might receive more than the residual estate falling to the heir or heirs. This second part of the Voconian Law became obsolete with the subsequent growth of huge fortunes, and was superseded by the Falcidian Law of 40 B.C.; the prohibition of heirship by women seems to have become a dead letter after about A.D. 100 (latest reference in Pliny, Panegyric 42).

[4] A fragment of Cato's speech is preserved in Gellius, Noctes Atticae XVII. 6: "In the beginning the woman brought you a great dowry; then she holds back a large sum of money, which she does not entrust to the control of her husband, but lends it to her husband. Later, becoming angry with him, she orders a slave whom she has reserved as her own to hound him and demand the money," tr. Rolfe, L.C.L.; the rendering of servum recepticium (the phrase for the sake of explaining which Gellius quoted the fragment, has been altered).

BOOK XLII

LIBER XLII

a.u.c. 581

I. L. Postumius Albinus M. Popilius Laenas consules [1] cum omnium primum de provinciis et [2] exercitibus ad senatum rettulissent, Ligures utrique decreti sunt, ut novas ambo quibus eam provinciam obtinerent legiones—binae singulis decretae—et socium Latini nominis dena milia peditum et sescenos [3] equites, et supplementum Hispaniae tria milia peditum Romanorum scriberent et ducentos equites. Ad hoc mille et quingenti pedites Romani cum centum equitibus [4] scribi iussi, cum quibus praetor cui Sardinia obtigisset in Corsicam transgressus bellum gereret; interim M. Atilius, vetus praetor, provinciam obtineret Sardiniam. Praetores deinde provincias sortiti sunt, A. Atilius Serranus urbanam, C. Cluvius Saxula inter cives et peregrinos, N.[5] Fabius Buteo Hispaniam citeriorem, M. Matienus ulteriorem, M. Furius Crassipes Siciliam, C. Cicereius Sardiniam. Priusquam in provincias [6] magistratus proficiscerentur, senatui placuit, L. Postumium consulem ad agrum publicum a privato terminandum

[1] consules add. Luchs: om. V.
[2] et add. Vahlen: exsercitibus V.
[3] sescenos Drakenborch: sescentos V.
[4] equitibus Fr.: equitibus $\overline{CC}$ V.
[5] N. Sigonius: cn. V.
[6] provincias add. Kreyssig: om. V.

BOOK XLII

I. WHEN the consuls Lucius Postumius Albinus and B.C. 173
Marcus Popilius Laenas had first of all referred to the senate the question of the provinces and the armies, the Ligurians were decreed to them both, with the provision that they should each enlist legions with which to hold this province—two were decreed to each—and for each also ten thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin confederacy, and as a reinforcement for Spain three thousand Roman infantry and two hundred cavalry. It was also ordered that fifteen hundred Roman infantry and one hundred cavalry be enrolled, taking whom the praetor to whose lot Sardinia should have fallen was to cross to Corsica to prosecute the war there; in the meantime Marcus Atilius, the old praetor, was to hold the province of Sardinia. The praetors then cast lots for the provinces. The civil jurisdiction was received by Aulus Atilius Serranus, that between citizens and aliens by Gaius Cluvius Saxula, Farther Spain by Numerius Fabius Buteo, Nearer Spain by Marcus Matienus, Sicily by Marcus Furius Crassipes, Sardinia by Gaius Cicereius. The senate decreed that before the magistrates departed for their provinces, Lucius Postumius the consul should proceed to Campania to determine the boundaries between the public and private lands, in Campaniam ire, cuius ingentem modum possidere

A.U.C. 581

7 privatos paulatim proferendo fines constabat. Hic iratus Praenestinis, quod, cum eo privatus [1] sacrificii [2] in templo Fortunae faciendi causa profectus esset, nihil in se honorifice neque publice neque privatim factum a Praenestinis esset, priusquam ab Roma proficisceretur, litteras Praeneste misit ut s[illegible]i magistratus obviam exiret, locum publice pararent [3] ubi deverteretur, iumentaque cum exiret inde praesto
8 essent.[4] Ante hunc consulem nemo umquam sociis
9 in ulla re oneri aut sumptui fuit. Ideo magistratus mulis tabernaculisque et omni alio instrumento militari ornabantur, ne quid tale imperarent sociis.
10 Privata hospitia habebant; ea benigne comiterque colebant, domusque eorum Romae hospitibus pate-
11 bant, apud quos ipsis deverti mos esset. Legati qui repente aliquo [5] mitterentur singula iumenta per oppida, iter qua faciendum erat, imperabant; aliam impensam socii in magistratus Romanos non faciebant.
12 Ira [6] consulis etiamsi iusta, non tamen in magistratu

[1] privatus Fr.: priuatas V.
[2] inter privatus(-as) et sacrificii, iterum paulatim—priuatus (sic) scripsit V, quae del. Fr.
[3] pararent Hertz: pararet V.
[4] essent Fr.: esset V.
[5] aliquo Fr.: aliquod V.
[6] ira Schel: iniuria V.

[1] Part of the ager Campanus had been sold (cf. XXXII. vii. 3), part leased (XXVII. xi. 8), but there is no record of renewals of any leases. By reason of this negligence both purchasers and lessors had gradually included larger areas in their holdings, and the long unchallenged possessio gave even lessors an opportunity to claim ownership. What occasioned this sudden interest in the matter in unknown. For the results see chap. xix. below.

since it was well known that private persons, by B.C. 173 gradually moving their boundaries outward, were occupying a very large part of it.[1] Postumius being angry at the people of Praeneste because, when he had journeyed thither as a private citizen for the purpose of offering sacrifice in the temple of Fortune, no mark of respect[2] had been shown by that people, either officially or unofficially, before he set out from Rome sent a message to Praeneste to the effect that the magistrate should come out to meet him, that they should engage at public expense quarters for his entertainment, and that when he should leave there transport-animals should be in readiness. Before his consulship no one had ever put the allies to any trouble or expense in any respect.[3] Magistrates were supplied with mules and tents and all other military equipment, precisely in order that they might not give any such command to the allies. The senators generally had private relations of hospitality,[4] which they generously and courteously cultivated, and their homes at Rome were open to the guests at whose houses they themselves were wont to lodge. Ambassadors who were sent on short notice to any place would call upon the towns through which their route took them, for one pack-animal each: no other expense did the allies incur in behalf of Roman officials. The anger of the consul, even if it was justifiable, should nevertheless not have found vent

[2] As a privatus, Postumius had no right to demand or expect any sign of honour from an allied city. The incident may be regarded as an indication of the growing feeling of superiority of Rome with respect to her allies. Cf. sect. 12 below.

[3] But Livy has previously mentioned such expenditures as customary for allies outside of Italy, XXXII. xxvii. 4.

[4] Cf. XXXVII. liv. 6 and the note.

A.U.C. 581

exercenda, et silentium nimis [1] aut modestum aut timidum [2] Praenestinorum ius, velut [3] probato exemplo, magistratibus fecit graviorum in dies talis generis imperiorum.

II. Principio huius anni legati qui in Aetoliam et Macedoniam missi erant renuntiarunt, sibi conveniendi regis Persei, cum alii abesse eum [4] alii aegrum esse, falso utrumque, fingerent, potestatem non 2 factam. Facile tamen apparuisse sibi, bellum [5] parari, nec ultra ad arma ire dilaturum. Item in Aetolia seditionem gliscere [6] in dies, neque discordiarum principes auctoritate sua coerceri potuisse. 3 Cum bellum Macedonicum in expectatione esset, priusquam id susciperetur, prodigia expiari pacemque deum peti precationibus, qui [7] editi ex fatalibus libris 4 essent, placuit. Lanuvi classis magnae species in caelo visa dicebatur,[8] et Priverni lana pulla terra enata, et in [9] Veienti apud Rementem lapidatum; 5 Pomptinum omne velut nubibus lucustarum coopertum esse; in Gallico agro, qua induceretur aratrum, sub existentibus glaebis pisces emersisse. Ob haec 6 prodigia libri fatales inspecti, editumque ab decemviris est et quibus[10] diis quibusque hostiis sacrificaretur,

[1] nimis Fr.: minis V.
[2] timidum Fr.: tumidum V.
[3] ius velut Fr.: iussu velut V.
[4] eum Fr.: cum V.
[5] bellum Fr.: non bellum V.
[6] gliscere Fr.: discere (sic) V.
[7] qui J. F. Gronovius: que V.
[8] visa dicebatur J. F. Gronovius: uisae dicebantur V.
[9] terra enata et in Fr.: terrenaefin V.
[10] quibus Fr.: ex quibus V.

while he was in office, and its silent acceptance by the Praenestines, whether too modest or too fearful, established, as by an approved precedent, the right of magistrates to make demands of this sort, which grew more burdensome day by day. B.C. 173

II. In the beginning of this year the ambassadors who had been sent[1] to Aetolia and Macedonia reported that an opportunity to interview King Perseus, since some pretended that he was away, some that he was ill (but both falsely), had not been given them. Nevertheless, they said, it had become easily apparent to them that preparations for war were being made and that Perseus would not further put off his resort to arms. The ambassadors also reported that the strife in Aetolia was growing daily, and that the leaders in the disputes could not be restrained by their authority. Since a Macedonian war was in prospect, before it should be undertaken it was decreed that atonement should be made by reason of the prodigies and the peace of the gods should be sought by the rituals which had been published from the oracular books. At Lanuvium the vision of a great fleet was said to have been seen in the sky, and at Privernum that dark-coloured wool had grown from the earth, and in the Veientine country about Remens that there had been a shower of stones: it was reported that the whole Pomptine region had been covered by clouds, one might say, of locusts; and that in the Gallic land, wherever the plough was driven, fish came forth from the upturned sod. By reason of these prodigies the oracular books were consulted, and announcement was made by the decemvirs to what gods and with what victims the sacrifices should

[1] Cf. XLI. xxv 5, also xxvii. 4, and xxii. 3.

A.U.C. 581

7 et ut supplicatio[1] prodigiis expiandis fieret, alteraque quae[2] priore anno valetudinis populi causa vota esset, ea uti fieret feriaeque[3] essent. Itaque sacrificatum[4] est ut decemviri scriptum ediderant.[5]

III. Eodem anno aedis Iunonis Laciniae detecta. Q. Fulvius Flaccus censor aedem Fortunae Equestris, quam in Hispania praetor bello Celtiberico voverat, faciebat enixo studio ne ullum Romae amplius aut 2 magnificentius templum esset. Magnum ornatum[6] ei templo ratus adiecturum, si tegulae marmoreae essent, profectus in Bruttios aedem Iunonis Laciniae ad partem dimidiam detegit, id satis fore ratus[7] 3 ad tegendum quod aedificaretur. Naves paratae fuerunt quae tollerent atque asportarent, auctoritate censoria sociis deterritis id sacrilegium prohibere. 4 Postquam censor redit, tegulae expositae de navibus 5 ad templum portabantur. Quamquam unde essent silebatur, non tamen celari potuit. Fremitus igitur[8] in curia ortus est; ex omnibus partibus postulabatur ut consules eam rem ad senatum referrent. Ut vero accersitus in curiam censor venit, multo infestius

[1] supplicatio Fr.: supplicatioque V.
[2] alteraque quae Madvig: anlteraque (sic) V.
[3] fieret feriaeque Hertz: feriaeque V.
[4] itaque sacrificatum Fr.: ita sacrificatumque V.
[5] ediderant Madvig: ediderunt V.
[6] ornatum Madvig: ornantum V.
[7] ratus Fr.: iratus V.
[8] igitur Fr.: eius igitur V.

[1] Concerning this noted temple, cf. XXIV. iii., XXVIII. xlvi. 16, XXX. xx. 6. Valerius Maximus, I. i. 20, "moralizes" the story, telling how Fulvius became mentally unbalanced, be performed, and it was directed that a period of B.C. 173 prayer should be celebrated in atonement for the prodigies and that a second such period should be observed which had been vowed a year before for the sake of the health of the people and that a festival should be held. Accordingly sacrifice was offered in the manner which the decemvirs had published in writing.

III. In the same year the temple of Juno Lacinia[1] was stripped of its roof. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus as censor was building the temple to Fortuna Equestris which he had vowed while praetor in Spain during the Celtiberian war,[2] striving zealously that there should be no temple in Rome larger or more splendid. Considering that it would add great beauty to the temple if the roof tiles were of marble, he set out for Bruttium and stripped the temple of Juno Lacinia of its tiles up to half their number, thinking that these would be sufficient to cover the building which was now being erected. Ships were made ready to load and transport them, the inhabitants being prevented by the censor's high office from forbidding the sacrilege. When the censor returned the tiles were unloaded from the ships and were being taken to the temple. Although nothing was said as to where they were obtained, yet such an act could not be concealed. There was accordingly an outcry in the senate: from all sides the demand was made that the consuls should lay the question before that body. But when the censor was summoned and entered the senate-and died as a result of hearing that one son had been killed and the other severely wounded in Macedonia; cf. below, ch. xxviii. 10–12.

[2] Cf. XL. xl. 10.

A.U.C. 581

6 singuli universique praesentem lacerare: templum augustissimum regionis eius,[1] quod non Pyrrhus, non Hannibal violassent, violare parum habuisse, nisi[2] 7 detexisset foede ac prope diruisset. Detractum culmen templo, nudatum tectum patere imbribus putrefaciendum. Ad[3] id censorem moribus regendis creatum? Cui sarta tecta exigere sacris publicis et 8 locare[4] tuenda more maiorum traditum esset, eum per sociorum urbes diruentem templa nudantemque tecta aedium sacrarum vagari! Et quod, si in privatis sociorum aedificiis faceret, indignum videri posset, id eum templa deum[5] immortalium demo- 9 lientem facere, et obstringere religione populum Romanum, ruinis templorum templa aedificantem, tamquam non iidem ubique di immortales sint, sed 10 spoliis aliorum alii colendi exornandique! Cum priusquam referretur appareret quid sentirent patres, relatione facta in unam omnes sententiam ierunt ut eae tegulae reportandae in templum locarentur[6] 11 piaculariaque[7] Iunoni fierent. Quae ad religionem pertinebant[8] cum cura facta; tegulas relictas in area templi, quia reponendarum nemo artifex inire rationem potuerit, redemptores nuntiarunt.

IV. Ex praetoribus, qui in provincias ierant, N. Fabius Massiliae moritur, cum in citeriorem

[1] eius Fr.: eiu . . . eius (sic) V.
[2] nisi Fr.: side V. [3] ad add. Hartel: om. V.
[4] locare Madvig: loca V.
[5] templa deum add. Heraeus: om. V.
[6] locarentur add. Fr.: om. V.
[7] piaculariaque Fr.: iaeculariaque (sic) V.
[8] pertinebant Wesenberg: pertinent V.

house, one and all assailed him to his face far more violently: the most venerable shrine of that region, a shrine which neither Pyrrhus nor Hannibal had violated, he had not been content with violating but had shamefully robbed it of its covering and well-nigh destroyed it. The top, they said, had been torn from the temple and the bare framing laid open to be rotted by the rains. Was it for this, they demanded, that a censor was chosen to control behaviour? That the magistrate to whom had been entrusted, in the fashion of the forefathers, the duty of enforcing the repair of public shrines and of contracting for their maintenance, was himself roving through the cities of the allies plundering the temples and stripping off the roofs of sacred edifices! A thing, they continued, which might well seem unworthy if done to private buildings of the allies, he was doing when he destroyed the temples of the immortal gods, and fastening upon the Roman people the guilt of impiety, building temples with the ruins of temples, just as if the immortal gods were not the same everywhere, but that some should be worshipped and adorned with the spoils of others! When it was clear, before the vote was taken, what the sentiment of the Fathers was, when the motion was put, all unanimously decreed that a contract should be let for carrying the tiles back to the temple and that atonements should be offered to Juno. Those matters which concerned expiation were scrupulously performed; the contractors reported that the tiles had been left in the court of the temple because no workman could devise a plan for replacing them. B.C. 178

IV. Of the praetors who had gone to the provinces, Numerius Fabius died at Massilia, while he was on

A.U.C. 581

2 Hispaniam iret. Itaque cum id nuntiatum a[1] Massiliensibus legatis esset, senatus decrevit ut P. Furius et Cn. Servilius quibus[2] succedebatur inter se sortirentur, uter citeriorem Hispaniam prorogato 3 imperio obtineret. Sors opportuna fuit, ut[3] P. Furius idem, cuius ea provincia fuerat, remaneret.

Eodem anno, cum agri Ligustini et Gallici, quod bello captum erat aliquantum vacaret, senatus consultum factum,[4] ut is ager viritim divideretur. 4 Decemviros in eam rem[5] ex senatus consulto creavit A. Atilius praetor urbanus M. Aemilium Lepidum C. Cassium T. Aebutium Parrum C. Tremellium P. Cornelium Cethegum Q. et L. Apuleios M. Caecilium C. Salonium C. Munatium. Diviserunt dena iugera in singulos, sociis nominis Latini terna.

5 Per idem tempus, quo haec agebantur, legati ex Aetolia Romam venerunt de discordiis seditionibusque suis,[6] et Thessali legati nuntiantes quae in Macedonia gererentur.

V. Perseus bellum iam[7] vivo patre cogitatum in animo volvens omnes non gentes modo Graeciae, sed civitates etiam legationibus mittendis, pollicendo 2 plura quam praestando, sibi conciliabat. Erant autem[8] magnae partis[9] hominum ad favorem eius

[1] a add. Fr.: om. V.
[2] inter quibus et succedebatur iterum cum id—esset scripsit V, quae alia manus delevit, signa .·. .·. super scribens.
[3] ut add. Pighius: om. V.
[4] factum Fr.: sit factum V. [5] rem add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] seditionibusque suis Fr.: seditionibus suisque V.
[7] bellum iam Madvig: iam bellum V.
[8] autem Madvig: tamen V. [9] partis Kreyssig: pariter V.

[1] Inclusion of allies in such distributions seems to have been unprecedented.
[2] See supra, ii. 2.

his way to Nearer Spain. Therefore, when news of B.C. 173
this was brought by ambassadors from Massilia, the senate decreed that Publius Furius and Gnaeus Servilius, who were being replaced, should cast lots and decide between them which should govern Nearer Spain under an extension of his imperium. The lot was fortunate in that Publius Furius, the same man under whose command that province had been, was selected to remain.

The same year, since a considerable part of the Ligurian and Gallic land which had been captured in war was unoccupied, a decree of the senate was passed that this land should be assigned to individuals. For this purpose and in accordance with the decree of the senate, the praetor urbanus, Aulus Atilius, presided at the election as decemvirs of Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Gaius Cassius, Titus Aebutius Parrus, Gaius Tremellius, Publius Cornelius Cethegus, Quintus and Lucius Apuleius, Marcus Caecilius, Gaius Salonius, Gaius Munatius. Their allotments to individual citizens were ten iugera each, to allies of the Latin confederacy, three each.[1]

About the same time that these events occurred, ambassadors from Aetolia came to Rome to report concerning the quarrels and internal strife of the Aetolians,[2] as well as Thessalian ambassadors bringing news of what was happening in Macedonia.

V. Perseus, pondering in his mind the war which had been planned even before his father's death, was striving to win over to himself not only all the states of Greece but also the cities, sending embassies and making promises rather than carrying them out. Moreover, the sympathies of a large proportion of the people were for him, and they were much more inclinati animi, et aliquanto quam in Eumenem propensiores, cum Eumenis beneficiis muneribusque omnes Graeciae civitates et plerique principum obligati essent, et ita se in regno suo gereret ut quae sub dicione eius urbes essent,[1] nullius liberae civitatis fortunam secum mutatam vellent. Contra Persea fama erat post patris mortem uxorem manu sua occidisse; Apellem,[2] ministrum quondam fraudis in fratre tollendo atque ob id [3] quaesitum a Philippo ad supplicium, exulantem [4] accersitum post patris mortem ingentibus promissis ad praemia tantae perpetratae rei clam interfecisse. Intestinis externisque praeterea multis caedibus infamem nec ullo commendabilem merito praeferebant vulgo civitates tam pio erga propinquos, tam iusto in cives, tam munifico erga omnes homines regi, seu fama et maiestate Macedonum regum praeoccupati ad spernendam [5] originem novi regni, seu mutationis rerum cupidi, seu quia omnia [6] non obiecta esse Romanis volebant. Erant autem non Aetoli modo in seditionibus propter ingentem vim aeris alieni, sed Thessali etiam; et [7] contagione velut tabes in Perrhaebiam quoque id pervaserat malum. Cum

A.U.C. 581

[1] essent add. Curio: om. V.
[2] Apellem Fr.: apellemne V.
[3] id Kreyssig: id et V.
[4] exulantem Fr.: exultantem V.
[5] spernendam J. F. Gronovius: sperendium V.
[6] omnia add. Goldbacher: om. V.
[7] et J. F. Gronovius: ea V.

[1] The kingdom of Pergamum dated only from Attalus I, father of Eumenes.

[2] Whether the order of possible explanations is intended by Livy to be climactic, we cannot judge. One suspects that inclined to favour him than Eumenes, although the acts of kindness and generosity of Eumenes had put all of the cities of Greece and many important personages under obligations to him, and he so conducted himself in his kingdom that the cities which were under his control did not desire to exchange their condition for that of any free state. On the other hand, there was the rumour that after his father's death Perseus had killed his wife with his own hand; that Apelles, once the agent of treachery in the murder of his brother, who for that reason had been sought out for punishment by Philip, he had recalled from exile, after the death of his father, with lavish offers of rewards for performing so splendid a deed, and then had secretly put to death. A man made infamous by many other murders of citizens and aliens, and worthy of praise for no good quality whatever, was generally preferred by the states to a king so devoted to his relatives, so just to his citizens, so generous to all men, whether because these states were predisposed, on account of the reputation and dignity of the Macedonian kings, to despise the origin of a kingdom recently formed,[1] or because they were eager for a change in their condition, or because they did not wish all things to become completely subject to the Romans.[2] But it was not the Aetolians alone who were in a state of civil war because of the huge burden of debt, but also the Thessalians; and spreading by contact like a pestilence, the evil had reached even into Perrhaebia. When the news came B.C. 173 anti-Roman elements, as well as others more purely patriotic, now saw in Perseus their only hope of escape from Roman domination, as once the Greeks had looked to the Romans to save them from Philip.

A.U.C. 581

Thessalos in armis esse nuntiatum esset,[1] Ap. Claudium legatum ad eas res aspiciendas componen-
9 dasque senatus misit. Qui utriusque partis principibus castigatis, cum iniusto faenore gravatum aes alienum, ipsis magna ex parte concedentibus qui onerarant levasset, iusti crediti solutionem in decem annorum[2]
10 pensiones distribuit. Per eundem Appium eodemque modo compositae in Perrhaebia res. Aetolorum causas M.[3] Marcellus Delphis per idem tempus iisdem[4] hostilibus actas animis quos[5] intestino gesserant 11 bello cognovit. Cum certatum utrimque temeritate atque audacia cerneret, decreto quidem suo neutram partem aut levare aut onerare voluit; communiter ab utrisque petit abstinerent bello et oblivione praeteri-
12 torum[6] discordias finirent. Huius reconciliationis inter ipsos fides obsidibus ultro citroque datis firmata est. Corinthus, ut ibi[7] deponerentur obsides, convenit.

VI. A Delphis et Aetolico concilio Marcellus in Peloponnesum traiecit Aegium,[8] quo Achaeis edixerat
2 conventum. Ubi collaudata gente quod constanter vetus decretum de arcendis aditu finium regibus Macedonum tenuissent, insigne adversus Persea
3 odium[9] Romanorum fecit; quod ut maturius

[1] esset J. F. Gronovius: est V.
[2] decem annorum Weissenborn: zannorum V.
[3] M. add. Madvig: om. V.
[4] iisdem add. Madvig: om. V. [5] quos Ruperti: quas V.
[6] praeteritorum Fr.: praetorum V.
[7] ut ibi Kreyssig: utubi V.
[8] Aegium add. H. J. Mueller: om. V.
[9] Persea odium Fr.: persedonum V.

[1] Marcellus, in calling a council, overstepped the bounds set by the senate in 184 B.C. (XXXIX. xxxiii. 8), but perhaps Livy has not stated the facts exactly.

that the Thessalians were in arms, the senate sent B.C. 173
Appius Claudius as commissioner to investigate and settle these affairs. He, after reproving the leaders of both factions and lightening the burden of the debts which had been made more grievous by illegal interest, the majority of the creditors who had imposed it having made this concession, provided for the payment of the just debts in ten annual installments. The difficulties in Perrhaebia were settled by the same Appius and on the same basis. Marcus Marcellus, who was at Delphi about the same time, learned that the Aetolians were pleading their cases in the same belligerent spirit which they had shown in their civil war. When he saw that both sides were contending with reckless violence, he was unwilling, so far as his decree was concerned, either to lighten or to increase the burden of either side; he asked the two in common to refrain from their warfare and to end their quarrels in forgetfulness of the past. By an exchange of hostages they gave assurance of their mutual good faith in their reconciliation. Corinth was designated as the place in which the hostages should be placed in custody.

VI. From Delphi and the meeting of the Aetolian council Marcellus crossed to Aegium in the Peloponnesus, where he had called[1] a meeting of the Achaeans. There, having heartily praised the people because they had steadfastly adhered to their old resolution[2] not to permit the kings of the Macedonians to enter their territory, he made conspicuous the hatred which the Romans felt for Perseus; that this hatred should break out betimes was the conse-

[1] Cf. XLI. xxiii. 1.

A.U.C. 581

erumperet, Eumenes rex commentarium ferens secum, quod de apparatibus belli omnia inquirens
4 fecerat, Romam venit. Per idem tempus quinque legati ad regem missi, qui res in Macedonia aspicerent. Alexandriam iidem ad Ptolemaeum renovandae
5 amicitiae causa proficisci iussi. Legati erant hi: C. Valerius C. Lutatius Cerco Q. Baebius Sulca M.
6 Cornelius Mammula M. Caecilius Denter. Et ab [1] Antiocho rege sub idem tempus legati venerunt; quorum princeps Apollonius in senatum introductus multis iustisque causis regem excusavit, quod stipen-
7 dium serius quam ad [2] diem praestaret; id se omne advexisse, ne cuius nisi temporis gratia regi fieret.
8 Donum praeterea afferre, vasa aurea quingentum pondo. Petere regem ut, quae cum patre suo societas atque amicitia fuisset, ea secum renovaretur, imperaretque sibi populus Romanus, quae bono fidelique socio regi essent imperanda; se in [3] nullo
9 usquam cessaturum officio. Ea merita in se [4] senatus fuisse cum Romae esset, eam comitatem iuventutis, ut pro rege non pro obside omnibus
10 ordinibus fuerit. Legatis benigne responsum, et societatem renovare cum Antiocho quae cum patre eius fuerat, A. Atilius praetor urbanus iussus.
11 Quaestores urbani stipendium, vasa aurea censores

[1] ab add. Fr.: om. V.
[2] quam ad Duker: quoad V.
[3] in add. Wesenberg: om. V.
[4] se add. Fr.: om. V.

[1] Ptolemy V (Epiphanes) had been succeeded in 181 B.C. by the boy Ptolemy VI (Philometor), but Livy has not previously mentioned the fact.

[2] For the Romanizing of Antiochus Epiphanes, cf. XLI. xx. 1 ff.

quence of the arrival in Rome of King Eumenes, B.C. 173 bringing with him a memorandum which he had prepared, after thorough investigation, as to Perseus' preparations for war. About the same time five commissioners were sent to the king to look into the situation in Macedonia. They were also instructed to proceed to Alexandria for the purpose of renewing the friendship of the Romans with Ptolemy.[1] The commissioners were the following: Gaius Valerius, Gaius Lutatius Cerco, Quintus Baebius Sulca, Marcus Cornelius Mammula, Marcus Caecilius Denter. From King Antiochus[2] also came ambassadors about the same time: their chief, Apollonius, when he was given an audience before the senate, made explanations for the king, giving many plausible reasons why he was paying his tribute later than the appointed day; he had, he said, brought the entire sum with him in order that the king might ask no indulgence except in the matter of the delay. In addition, he said that he was bringing, as a gift, golden vases of five hundred pounds' weight. The king begged that the alliance and friendship which had existed with his father might be renewed with him too, and that the Roman people would give him any orders which were proper to give to a king who was a loyal and faithful ally; he would fail in no performance of duty. The senate, the ambassador went on, had rendered such services to the king when he was in Rome, the young men such courtesy, that all ranks had regarded him as a king, not as a hostage. The ambassadors received a gracious reply, and Aulus Atilius, the praetor urbanus, was instructed to renew with Antiochus the treaty which had existed with his father. The city quaestors received the tribute, the acceperunt, eisque negotium datum est ut ponerent ea in quibus templis videretur; legato[1] centum milium aeris munus missum et aedes liberae hospitio datae sumptusque decretus, donec in Italia esset. 12 Legati qui in Syria fuerant renuntiaverant[2] in maximo eum honore apud regem esse amicissimumque populo Romano.

A.U.C. 581

VII. In provinciis eo anno haec acta.[3] C. Cicereius praetor in Corsica signis collatis pugnavit; septem milia Corsorum caesa, capti amplius mille et septingenti. Voverat in ea pugna praetor aedem Iunoni 2 Monetae. Pax deinde data petentibus Corsis, et exacta cerae ducenta[4] milia pondo. Ex Corsica 3 subacta Cicereius in Sardiniam transmisit. Et in Liguribus in agro Statellati pugnatum ad oppidum Carystum. Eo se magnus exercitus Ligurum con- 4 tulerat. Primo sub adventum M. Popili consulis moenibus sese continebant; deinde, postquam oppidum oppugnaturum Romanum cernebant, pro- 5 gressi ante portas aciem struxerunt. Nec consul, ut qui id ipsum oppugnatione comminanda quaesisset, moram certamini fecit. Pugnatum amplius tres est 6 horas ita ut neutro inclinaret spes. Quod ubi consul vidit nulla parte moveri Ligurum signa, imperat equitibus ut equos conscendant ac tribus simul partibus in hostes quanto maximo possent tumultu incurrant.

[1] legato Vahlen: que legato V.
[2] renuntiaverant Crévier: renuntiauerunt V.
[3] acta add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[4] ducenta Crévier: ducena V.

[1] The usual procedure was to give 2000 asses to each member of an embassy (cf. e.g. xix. 6 below); the last sentence of the chapter may explain the senate's generosity to Apollonius.

censors the golden vases, and the responsibility was B.C. 173 delegated to them of depositing them in whatever temples they saw fit; the ambassador [1] received one hundred thousand as-pieces as a gift, and a house, free of charge, was given for his entertainment, and his expenses, so long as he should be in Italy, were provided for by decree. The Roman ambassadors who had been in Syria had reported that Apollonius stood in highest favour with the king and was most friendly to the Roman people.

VII. The following were the events of the year in the provinces: Gaius Cicereius the praetor fought a pitched battle in Corsica; seven thousand of the Corsicans were killed and more than seventeen hundred captured. During that battle the praetor had vowed a temple to Juno Moneta. Peace was then granted at the request of the Corsicans, and two hundred thousand pounds of wax demanded of them. Having subdued Corsica, Cicereius then crossed into Sardinia. Among the Ligurians also there was a battle near the town of Carystus in the territory of Statellae. Thither a great army of Ligurians had assembled. At first, at the approach of Marcus Popilius the consul, they kept within their ramparts; later, when they saw that the Roman was about to assault the town, they moved out and formed in line of battle in front of the gates. Nor did the consul, since he had sought just this by threatening an assault, delay the engagement. The battle raged for more than three hours in such a way that hope inclined to neither side. Then, when the consul saw that the Ligurian masses were nowhere shaken, he ordered the cavalry to mount their horses and to charge the enemy at three points at the same time and with all

A.U.C. 581

7 Pars magna equitum mediam traiecit aciem et ad terga pugnantium pervasit. Inde terror iniectus
8 Liguribus; diversi in omnes partes fugerunt, perpauci retro in oppidum, quia inde se maxime obiecerat eques. Et pugna tam pervicax multos absumpserat
9 Ligurum, et in fuga passim caesi sunt. Decem milia hominum caesa traduntur, amplius septingenti
10 capti,[1] signa militaria relata octoginta duo. Nec[2] incruenta victoria fuit: amplius tria milia militum amissa, cum cedentibus neutris ex parte utraque primores caderent.

VIII. Post hanc pugnam ex diversa fuga in unum collecti Ligures, cum maiorem multo partem civium amissam quam superesse cernerent—nec enim plus decem milia hominum erant—dediderunt sese, nihil
2 quidem illi pacti; speraverant tamen, non[3] atrocius quam superiores imperatores consulem in se saevitu-
3 rum. At ille arma omnibus ademit, oppidum diruit, ipsos bonaque eorum vendidit; litterasque senatui
4 de rebus ab se gestis misit. Quas cum A. Atilius praetor in curia recitasset—nam consul alter Postumius agris recognoscendis[4] in Campania occupatus
5 aberat—atrox res visa senatui, Statellates, qui uni ex Ligurum gente non tulissent arma adversus Romanos, tum quoque oppugnatos, non ultro

[1] capti Madvig: passim capti V.
[2] Nec add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] non add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] recognoscendis Fr.: secognoscendis V.

possible uproar. A large part of the cavalry pene- B.C. 173
trated the centre of the line and pushed their way through to the rear of the fighters. As a result, the Ligurians were thrown into a panic; they scattered in flight in all directions, very few returning to the town because there more than anywhere else the cavalry had thrown themselves in the way. Not only had a fight so stubborn destroyed many of the Ligurians, but others also were cut down in their random flight. It is said that ten thousand men were killed, and more than seven hundred captured, and that eighty-two military standards were brought back. Nor was the victory bloodless: more than three thousand Roman soldiers were lost, since the front ranks on both sides were slain when neither army gave way.

VIII. When the Ligurians, after this battle, had assembled in one place from their scattered flight, and they saw that a far greater number of their citizens was lost than saved—for there were not more than ten thousand of them—they surrendered, without, indeed, making any stipulations; nevertheless they had hoped that the consul would treat them with no greater severity than former commanders had shown. But he disarmed them all, demolished their town, and sold them and all their property; then he sent dispatches to the senate reporting his achievement. When Aulus Atilius the praetor had read them in the senate—for the other consul Postumius was absent, being busy in Campania with surveying the public lands—the action seemed outrageous to the senate, that the Statellates, who alone of the Ligurians had not made war on the Romans, who even on this occasion had been attacked

A.U.C. 581

inferentes bellum, deditos in fidem populi Romani omni ultimae crudelitatis exemplo laceratos ac
6 deletos esse, tot milia capitum innoxiorum, fidem implorantia populi Romani, ne quis umquam se postea dedere auderet, pessimo exemplo venisse, et distractos passim iustis quondam hostibus populi
7 Romani pacatos servire. Quas ob res placere senatui, M. Popilium consulem Ligures, pretio emptoribus reddito, ipsos restituere in libertatem, bonaque ut iis, quod[1] eius reciperari possit, reddantur curare;
8 arma quoque reddi, eaque omnia primo[2] quoque tempore fieri; nec ante consulem de provincia decedere quam deditos in sedem suam Ligures restituisset. Claram victoriam vincendo pugnantes,[3] non saeviendo in afflictos fieri.

IX. Consul, qua ferocia animi usus erat in Liguribus, eandem ad non parendum[4] senatui habuit.
2 Legionibus extemplo Pisas in hibernacula missis[5] iratus patribus, infestus[6] praetori Romam redit; senatuque extemplo ad aedem Bellonae vocato, multis
3 verbis invectus in praetorem qui, cum ob rem bello bene gestam uti diis immortalibus honos haberetur

[1] iis quod conj. Weissenborn, but in his text reads iis quicquid : isquiquod V.
[2] quoque—primo add. Madvig, omnia autem Heraeus om. V.
[3] pugnantes Clericus : oppugnantis V.
[4] parendum Fr. : parendum fuit V.
[5] hibernacula missis Fr. : hibernaculia missi (sic) V.
[6] infestus Fr. : infectus V.

[1] A surrender usually assumed that the lives and personal liberties of the surrendered would be respected. Senatorial policy toward the Ligurians had been somewhat vacillating, though never countenancing such severity as that of Popilius.

although they had not begun a war, who had entrusted B.C. 173 themselves to the good faith of the Roman people, should have been harassed and destroyed with every form of extreme cruelty, that so many thousands of innocent persons, calling upon the Roman people for protection, should have been sold—a fate which established the worst possible precedent and issued a warning that no one should ever dare in the future to surrender—and, scattered in every direction, should, though at peace, be slaves to those who had once been downright enemies of the Roman people.[1] For these reasons the senate decreed that the consul Marcus Popilius should restore to liberty the Ligurians themselves, returning the purchase-price to the purchasers, and should see to it that their property, such of it as could be recovered, should be given back to them; that their arms also should be returned to them; and that all this should be done at the earliest possible moment; and that the consul should not leave his province until he had re-established the surrendered Ligurians in their homes. A truly glorious victory, they added, was won by defeating men in battle, not by torturing the distressed.

IX. The consul turned the arrogance of soul which he had displayed towards the Ligurians to disobeying the senate. He straightway sent the legions into winter-quarters at Pisa, and himself, angry with the Fathers and enraged at the praetor, returned to Rome; and immediately summoning the senate to the temple of Bellona, he assailed at great length the praetor who, although by reason of the success in the war he ought to have put to the senate a motion that honour be paid to the immortal

A.U.C. 581

referre ad senatum debuisset, adversus se pro hostibus senatus consultum fecisset, quo victoriam suam ad Ligures transferret dedique iis prope con-
4 sulem praetor iuberet: itaque multam ei se dicere; a patribus postulare ut senatus consultum in se
5 factum tolli iuberent, supplicationemque, quam absente se ex[1] litteris de bene gesta re publica missis decernere debuerint, praesente se honoris[2] deorum primum causa, deinde et sui aliquo tamen
6 respectu decernerent. Nihilo lenioribus quam absens senatorum aliquot orationibus increpitus neutra impetrata re in provinciam redit.

7 Alter consul Postumius consumpta aestate in recognoscendis agris, ne visa[3] quidem provincia sua
8 comitiorum causa Romam redit. Consules C. Popilium Laenatem P. Aelium Ligurem creavit. Praetores exinde facti C. Licinius Crassus M. Iunius Pennus Sp. Lucretius Sp. Cluvius Cn. Sicinius C. Memmius iterum.[4]

X. Eo anno lustrum conditum est; censores erant Q. Fulvius Flaccus A. Postumius[5] Albinus; Postu-

[1] se ex Pithoeus: sex V.
[2] praesente se honoris Madvig: praesentes honores V.
[3] ne visa Fr.: neua V.
[4] C. Memmius iterum Fr.: sicterum V.
[5] Fulvius Flaccus, A. Postumius Albinus Sigonius: Fulvius Flaccus L. Postumius Albinus. Postumius Fr.: Fulus Albinus Postumius V.

[1] The ultimate fate of the Ligurians is unknown, but it appears that neither senate nor consul could coerce the other, and it is doubtful whether Popilius carried out the instructions. It may be inferred from the election of Popilius' brother as consul that he had some popular support. For the final outcome, see below, xxi.

gods, had proposed a decree of the senate directed B.C. 173 against Popilius and in favour of the enemy, by which he was transferring the consul's victory to the Ligurians and (although himself only a praetor) was almost ordering the consul to be delivered to them: therefore he imposed a fine upon the praetor; he begged the Fathers to order that the decree of the senate which had been passed against him should be repealed, and that the thanksgiving which they should have voted in his absence, in consequence of the dispatches which he had sent regarding his victory, should now be decreed in his presence: first, to render honour to the gods; second, to show at least some sign of respect to himself. The consul was attacked by a number of the senators in speeches no less severe than those delivered in his absence, and returned to his province without obtaining either petition.[1]

The other consul, Postumius, spent the summer surveying the public lands, and without seeing his province at all returned to Rome to hold the elections. He announced the choice of Gaius Popilius Laenas and Publius Aelius Ligur.[2] Next the praetors were chosen: Gaius Licinius Crassus, Marcus Junius Pennus, Spurius Lucretius, Spurius Cluvius, Gnaeus Sicinius, Gaius Memmius (for the second time).[3]

X. In that year the lustrum was closed; the censors were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus and Aulus Postumius

[2] According to the Fasti Capitolini, this is the first election at which two plebeians were chosen consuls.

[3] The name of Memmius is restored from x. 14 below. To judge from the reading of V (see the critical note), iterum belongs with Memmius, although no previous praetorship for him is recorded. Sicinius had been praetor in 183 B.C. (XXXIX. xlv. 2), so that perhaps iterum has been misplaced. I have not ventured to transpose it.

A.U.C. 581

2 mius condidit. Censa sunt civium Romanorum capita
3 ducenta sexaginta novem milia et quindecim, minor aliquanto numerus, quia L. Postumius consul pro contione edixerat, qui socium Latini nominis ex edicto C. Claudi consulis redire in civitates suas debuissent, ne quis eorum Romae, et omnes in suis
4 civitatibus censerentur. Concors et e re publica censura fuit. Omnes quos senatu moverunt quibusque equos ademerunt,[1] aerarios fecerunt et tribu moverunt;
5 neque ab altero notatum alter probavit. Fulvius aedem Fortunae Equestris quam proconsul in Hispania dimicans cum Celtiberorum legionibus voverat, annis [2] sex post quam voverat dedicavit, et scaenicos ludos per quadriduum, unum diem in circo fecit.
6 L. Cornelius Lentulus, decemvir sacrorum, eo anno mortuus est. In locum eius suffectus A. Postumius
7 Albinus. Lucustarum tantae nubes a mari [3] repente in Apuliam illatae sunt ut examinibus suis agros late 8 operirent.[4] Ad quam pestem frugum tollendam Cn. Sicinius, praetor designatus, cum imperio in [5] Apuliam missus, ingenti agmine hominum ad colligendas eas coacto aliquantum temporis absumpsit.

A.U.C. 582

9 Principium insequentis anni, quo C. Popilius et P. Aelius fuerunt consules, residuas contentiones ex
10 priore anno habuit. Patres referri de Liguribus renovarique senatus consultum volebant, et consul

[1] equos ademerunt Fr.: quas demerunt V.
[2] annis Lentz: annos V. [3] a mari Vahlen: amant V.
[4] operirent Fr.: operirentur V. [5] in add. Fr.: om. V.

[1] But the Periocha gives 267,231.
[2] Cf. IV. xxiv. 7, and the note. [3] Cf. above, iii. 1.
[4] This action was necessary since M. Popilius was no longer a consul.

Albinus; Postumius closed the lustrum. The number of Roman citizens listed in the census was 269,015,[1] a somewhat smaller number because the consul Lucius Postumius had proclaimed before an assembly that of the allies of the Latin confederacy who had been obligated, under the edict of Gaius Claudius the consul, to return to their cities, no one should be listed at Rome but all in their own cities. The censorship was harmonious and useful to the state. All those whom they expelled from the senate or whose horses they took away were transferred to the aerarii[2] and removed from their tribes; neither censor approved anyone who had been marked for censure by the other. Fulvius dedicated the temple of Fortuna Equestris which, as proconsul in Spain, he had vowed while fighting with the legions of the Celtiberians, six[3] years after he had vowed it, and he gave theatrical performances for four days and one day in the circus. B.C. 173

Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, decemvir in charge of sacrifices, died that year. To replace him Aulus Postumius Albinus was chosen. Such great clouds of locusts from the sea suddenly appeared over Apulia that they covered the fields far and wide with their swarms. To destroy this pest, so fatal to crops, Gnaeus Sicinius, praetor-elect, was invested with the imperium and sent to Apulia, and assembling a vast crowd of men to collect the locusts, spent a certain amount of time in this way.

The beginning of the following year, in the consulship of Gaius Popilius and Publius Aelius, continued the unfinished controversies of the preceding year. The Fathers wished the decree of the senate regarding the Ligurians to be resubmitted and re-adopted,[4] and B.C. 172

A.U.C. 582

Aelius referebat. Popilius et collegam et senatum pro fratre deprecabatur, prae se ferens si quid decernerent 11 intercessurum. Collegam deterruit; patres eo magis utrique pariter consuli infensi, in incepto perstabant. Itaque cum de provinciis ageretur et Macedonia iam imminente Persei bello peteretur, Ligures am-
12 bobus consulibus decernunt;[1] Macedoniam decreturos negant, ni[2] de M. Popilio referretur. Postulantibus deinde ut novos exercitus scribere aut supplementum 13 veteribus liceret, utrumque negatum est. Praetoribus quoque in Hispaniam supplementum petentibus negatum, M. Iunio in[3] citeriorem, Sp. Lucretio in 14 ulteriorem. C. Licinius Crassus urbanam iurisdictionem, Cn. Sicinius inter peregrinos erat sortitus, C. Memmius Siciliam, Sp. Cluvius Sardiniam.
15 Consules ob ea irati senatui, Latinis feriis in primam quamque diem indictis, in provinciam abituros esse denuntiarunt, nec quicquam rei publicae acturos, praeterquam quod ad provinciarum administrationem attineret.

XI. Attalum, regis Eumenis fratrem, legatum venisse[4] Romam Valerius Antias his consulibus scribit ad deferenda de Perseo[5] crimina indicandosque apparatus belli. Plurium annales, et quibus credidisse

[1] decernunt Bekker: decernuntur V.
[2] ni add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] in add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] venisse Fr.: uidisse V.
[5] Perseo Fr.: persona V.

[1] Polybius (XXIV. 5) (L.C.L.) and Diodorus (XXIX. xxv) place the embassy of Attalus earlier; it may have been mentioned in some lost portion of Book XLI.

[2] It is uncertain who these other annalists were. Claudius Quadrigarius was probably one of them. For similar choices by Livy between divergent accounts, cf. V. xlvi. 11, VIII. xviii. 2, XXI. xxviii. 6, and xxxviii. (here Livy uses better principles than elsewhere), XXI. xlvi. 10, XXXVIII. lv. 8, XXXIX. liii (a careful discussion, but see the note, vol. XI., p. 385).

the consul Aelius was ready to submit it. Popilius B.C. 172
entreated both his colleague and the senate on behalf of his brother, declaring that if they passed any decree he would veto it. Aelius he discouraged from acting; the Fathers, enraged at both consuls alike for that reason, stood by their proposal the more vigorously. And so, when the question of provinces was taken up and Macedonia was sought after, because war with Perseus was now threatening, they decreed the Ligurians to both consuls; they refused to decree Macedonia unless the motion regarding Marcus Popilius were put to them. Then, when the consuls requested that they be authorized to enlist new armies or reinforcements for the old, both petitions were denied. The praetors also, who were asking for reinforcements for Spain, were refused, Marcus Junius for Nearer Spain, Spurius Lucretius for Farther Spain. Gaius Licinius Crassus had received the civil jurisdiction from the lots, Gnaeus Sicinius that between aliens, Sicily was assigned to Gaius Memmius, Sardinia to Spurius Cluvius. The consuls, angered at the senate for these reasons, proclaimed the Latin festival for the first available day and announced that they would set out to their province and would transact no public business except that which pertained to the government of the provinces.

XI. Valerius Antias writes[1] that Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, came as an ambassador to Rome in this same consulship, to lay charges against Perseus and to give an account of his preparations for war. The works of the majority of historians,[2]

[1] Livy seems to have learned historical discretion in the course of his huge task, but never quite attained to scientific criticism of his sources.

A.U.C. 582

2 malis, ipsum Eumenem venisse tradunt. Eumenes igitur ut Romam venit, exceptus cum tanto honore quantum non meritis tantum eius, sed beneficiis etiam suis, ingentia quae in eum congesta erant, existimabant [1] deberi, a praetore [2] in senatum est 3 introductus. Causam veniendi sibi Romam fuisse dixit praeter cupiditatem videndi [3] deos hominesque, quorum beneficio in ea fortuna esset, supra quam ne optare quidem auderet, etiam ut coram [4] moneret 4 senatum ut Persei conatis obviam iret. Orsus inde a Philippi consiliis necem Demetri filii rettulit, adversantis Romano bello; Bastarnarum gentem excitam sedibus suis, quorum auxiliis fretus in Italiam 5 transiret. Haec secum volutantem [5] in animo, oppressum fato, regnum ei reliquisse, quem infestissimum esse sensisset Romanis. Itaque Persea hereditarium a [6] patre relictum bellum et simul cum imperio traditum, iamiam proximum [7] alere ac fovere 6 omnibus consiliis. Florere praeterea iuventute quam stirpem longa pax ediderit, florere opibus regni, florere etiam aetate. Quae cum corporis robore ac viribus vigeat, animum esse inveteratum diutina arte atque 7 usu belli. Iam inde a puero patris contubernio Romanis quoque bellis, non finitimis [8] tantum

[1] existimabant Madvig: existimant V.
[2] a praetore Madvig: p̄r (sic) V.
[3] videndi edd. vett.: uiuendi V.
[4] coram Fr.: coronam V.
[5] haec secum volutantem Woelfflin: haec cum uoluntatem V.
[6] a add. Fr.: om. V.
[7] proximum Vahlen: primum V.
[8] finitimis Fr.: infinitumis V.

[1] Cf. XL. lvii. 6–9.

and men whom you would prefer to trust, say that B.C. 172
Eumenes himself came. Eumenes, then, on his arrival in Rome was received with such honours as they believed not only due to his deserts but also commensurate with their own favours which had been heaped upon him in abundance, and was introduced into the senate by the praetor. He said that the reason for his coming to Rome, in addition to his desire to see the gods and men by whose kindness he enjoyed a fortune beyond which he did not venture even to wish for anything, had been to give public warning to the senate that they should take measures against the designs of Perseus. Then, beginning with the plans of Philip, he spoke of the death of Philip's son Demetrius, who opposed the war with Rome, and mentioned the summoning of the people of the Bastarnae from their homes, relying on whose aid [1] Philip was to cross into Italy. While he was revolving such plans in his mind, death had overtaken him, and he had left his kingdom to the one who (he had seen) was most dangerous to the Romans. And so, Eumenes said, Perseus had long been preparing a war which had been left him as a legacy by his father and handed on to him along with the throne, and had been feeding and nursing it—it was now very close—by all possible schemes. Perseus, besides, was strong in the number of his young men, a generation which the long peace had brought forth, was strong in the resources of his kingdom, was strong too in his own youth. While he possessed strength and vigour of body, his mind too had been long trained in the theory and practice of war. Even from boyhood, in his fathers' tent, he had been made accustomed to wars with Rome, not merely to campaigns against their neigh-

A.U.C. 582

adsuetum, missum a patre in expeditiones multas
8 variasque. Iam ex quo ipse accepisset regnum, multa, quae non vi non dolo Philippus omnia expertus potuisset moliri, admirando rerum successu tenuisse.
9 Accessisse ad vires eam quae longo tempore multis magnisque meritis pareretur auctoritatem.

XII. Nam apud[1] Graeciae atque Asiae civitates vereri maiestatem eius omnes. Nec pro quibus meritis pro qua munificentia tantum ei tribuatur,
2 cernere nec dicere pro certo posse,[2] utrum felicitate id quadam eius accidat an, quod ipse vereatur dicere, invidia adversus Romanos favorem illi con-
3 ciliet. Inter ipsos quoque reges ingentem auctoritate esse[3] Seleuci filiam duxisse eum, non petentem, sed petitum ultro; sororem dedisse Prusiae precanti
4 atque[4] oranti; celebratas esse utrasque nuptias gratulatione donisque[5] innumerabilium legationum, et velut auspicibus nobilissimis populis deductas esse.
5 Boeotorum gentem, captatam Philippo, numquam ad
6 scribendum amicitiae foedus adduci potuisse; tribus nunc locis cum Perseo foedus incisum litteris esse, uno Thebis, altero ad Delium,[6] augustissimo et

[1] nam apud Fr.: nonaput V.
[2] certo posse Fr.: certumesse V.
[3] esse add. Hertz: om. V.
[4] atque oranti Kreyssig: adoranti V.
[5] donisque Fr.: donis V.
[6] altero ad Delium Madvig: alteradsidenum V.

[1] We can hardly question that fear of the Romans made many turn to Perseus as a possible source of freedom from Roman control.

[2] Cf. Dittenberger, Sylloge (3rd ed.) 639, a dedicatory inscription to the queen, Laodice, by the people of Delos.

[3] Livy has confused Greek and Roman ceremonies. The νυμφαγωγοί who escorted the bride assume also the (Roman) rôle of takers of the auspices. I have tried to suggest the dual meaning in the translation.

bours, and had been sent by his father on many and various expeditions. From the moment he had received the throne, Eumenes went on to say, he had gained, in a marvellous series of triumphs, many things which Philip had been unable to accomplish either by force or by craft, although he had left nothing untried. There had been added to his strength an influence which was usually acquired through a long period of time and by numerous and important services. B.C. 172

XII. For, said Eumenes, all men in the cities of Greece and Asia revered his dignity. In consideration of what services or what generosity such respect was being paid him, Eumenes could not see, or say for certain whether this was happening by reason of a certain good luck or whether—and Eumenes feared to suggest this—the ill-will felt for the Romans won men over to his cause.[1] Even among the kings he was great in influence and had married the daughter of Seleucus,[2] not having sought her but rather having been sought; he had given his sister to Prusias, who had begged and entreated for her; both marriages had been greeted with congratulations and gifts from countless embassies, and the nuptial processions were accompanied, as it were, by the noblest peoples as sponsors and attendants.[3] The Boeotian people, to whom Philip had paid court, could never be induced to sign any treaty of alliance; but now a treaty with Perseus was engraved in three places, one at Thebes, the second at Delium [4] in a

[4] The conjecture of Madvig has been adopted since Delium, conjectured by him, is in Boeotia; the alternative is Delos. The text is uncertain. For Delos as a publicity centre, cf. Polybius XXV. 3: "(Perseus) posted up lists of these (exiles) at Delos, Delphi, and the temple of Itonian Athena."

A.U.C. 582

celeberrimo in templo, tertio Delphis. In Achaico concilio vero, nisi discussa res per paucos Romanum imperium intentantes esset, eo rem [1] prope adductam
7 ut aditus ei in Achaiam daretur. At hercule suos honores, cuius merita in eam gentem privatim an publice sint maiora vix dici possit,[2] partim desertos per incultum ac neglegentiam, partim hostiliter sublatos esse. Iam Aetolos quem ignorare in seditionibus suis non ab Romanis, sed a Perseo praesidium
8 petisse? His eum fultum societatibus atque amicitiis eos domesticos apparatus belli habere ut externis non [3] egeat. Triginta milibus peditum, quinque milibus equitum in decem annos frumentum praeparasse, ut abstinere et suo et hostium agro frument-
9 andi causa possit. Iam pecuniam tantam habere ut decem milibus [4] mercennariorum militum praeter Macedonum copias stipendium in totidem annos praeparatum habeat, praeter annuum quod ex
10 metallis regiis capiat vectigal. Arma vel tribus tantis [5] exercitibus in armamentaria congessisse. Iuventutem, ut iam Macedonia deficiat, velut ex perenni fonte unde hauriat, Thraciam [6] subiectam esse.

XIII. Reliquum orationis adhortatio fuit. " Non ego haec " inquit " incertis iactata rumoribus et cupidius credita, quia vera esse de inimico crimina volebam, adfero ad vos, patres conscripti, sed com-

[1] eo rem Fr.: aeoru (sic) V.
[2] possit Madvig: posset V.
[3] ut externis non Fr.: non ut expertis non V.
[4] milibus J. F. Gronovius: milia V.
[5] tantis Sigonius: tantum V.
[6] Thraciam Fr.: theriam V.

[1] Cf. XLI. xxiii. [2] Cf. XXXIX. xxiv. 2.

most revered and celebrated temple, the third at Delphi. In the Achaean council, moreover, if the action had not been prevented by a few men who threatened them with the Roman might, matters were almost brought to such a pass that access into Achaea was granted him.[1] But, by Hercules, the honours of Eumenes himself, of whose services to that people it could hardly be determined whether the public or the private were the greater, had partly been abandoned from disuse and neglect, partly abolished in hostility. Again, who, he asked, did not know that the Aetolians in their internal strife had sought aid, not from the Romans, but from Perseus? Supported by these alliances and friendships, Perseus had such military resources at home that he did not need foreign aid. He had made ready a grain supply sufficient for ten years for thirty thousand infantry and five thousand cavalry, so that he could be independent of both his own and the enemy's land in the matter of provisions. He now possessed so much money that he had in readiness pay for ten thousand mercenary troops, for the same period of years, in addition to his Macedonian forces, besides the annual revenue which he derived from the royal mines.[2] Weapons for armies even three times as great had been heaped up by him in his arsenals. Now the youth of Thrace was placed under his control, from which he could draw as if from a never-failing spring in case Macedonia should ever be exhausted. B.C. 172

XIII. The rest of his speech was exhortation: "I am relating this to you, conscript Fathers," he said, "not as founded on uncertain rumours and too eagerly accepted because I wished these charges against an enemy to be true, but as ascertained and perta et explorata, haud secus[1] quam si speculator

a.u.c. 582
2 missus a vobis subiecta oculis referrem; neque relicto regno meo, quod amplum et egregium vos fecistis, mare tantum traiecissem ut vana ad vos
3 afferendo[2] fidem abrogarem mihi; cernebam nobilissimas Asiae et Graeciae civitates in dies magis denudantes iudicia sua, mox, si permitteretur, eo processuras unde receptum ad paenitendum non 4 haberent;[3] cernebam Persea non continentem se Macedoniae regno, alia armis occupantem, alia, quae vi subigi non possent,[4] favore ac benevolentia com-
5 plectentem; videbam quam impar esset sors, cum ille vobis bellum pararet[5] vos ei securam pacem praestaretis, quamquam mihi quidem non parare sed gerere paene bellum videbatur. Abrupolim, socium atque amicum vestrum, regno expulit;
6 Arthetaurum Illyrium, quia scripta ab eo quaedam vobis comperit, socium item atque amicum vestrum,
7 interfecit; Euersam et Callicritum Thebanos, principes civitatis, quia liberius adversus eum in concilio Boeotorum locuti fuerant delaturosque ad vos quae
8 agerentur, professi erant, tollendos curavit; auxilium Byzantiis adversus foedus tulit; Dolopiae bellum[6] intulit; Thessaliam et Doridem cum exercitu pervasit ut in bello intestino deterioris partis auxilio meliorem

[1] secus Fr.: secum V.
[2] afferendo Fr.: fecistis adferendo V.
[3] haberent Fr.: haberem V.
[4] possent Ruperti: possant V.
[5] pararet add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[6] bellum J. F. Gronovius: bella V.

[1] Cf. Polybius XXII. 18 (L.C.L.). If Livy has mentioned the episode it has been lost, perhaps in Book XLI.

discovered with as much accuracy as if I had been B.C. 172 sent by you as a scout to investigate and were reporting what lay before my eyes; nor should I have left my kingdom, which you have made extensive and noble, and crossed so great a sea, in order to diminish your confidence in me by bringing you an idle tale; I saw the most famed states of Asia and Greece daily laying bare their judgments more clearly, with the intention, if it were permitted, of proceeding so far presently that they would have no chance to draw back and repent; I saw Perseus not limiting himself to the kingdom of Macedonia, seizing some places by arms, and by influence and kindness winning over others which could not be subdued by force; I saw how unjust was the fortune that caused you, while he was preparing war on you, to grant him the security of peace, although to me indeed he seemed to be, not preparing war, but almost waging it. Abrupolis,[1] your ally and friend, he expelled from his kingdom; Arthetaurus,[2] the Illyrian, also your ally and friend, because he had learned of some written communications from him to you, he put to death; Eversa and Callicritus[3] the Thebans, leading men of their state, because they had spoken too freely against him in the Boeotian council and had declared that they would report to you what was going on, he caused to be done away with; he sent assistance to the Byzantines contrary to the treaty; he made war on Dolopia; he traversed Thessaly and Doris with his army, in order that he might in their civil war aid the worse cause and crush

[2] Cf. Appian, Bel. Mac. XI. 296.
[3] The episode seems not to be mentioned elsewhere.

A.U.C. 582

9 affligeret; confudit[1] et miscuit omnia in Thessalia Perrhaebiaque spe novarum tabularum, ut manu debitorum obnoxia[2] sibi optimates opprimeret. 10 Haec cum vobis quiescentibus et patientibus fecerit et concessam sibi Graeciam esse a vobis videat, pro certo habet neminem sibi antequam in Italiam 11 traiecerit, armatum occursurum. Hoc quam vobis tutum aut[3] honestum sit, vos videritis: ego certe mihi turpe esse duxi, prius Persea ad bellum inferendum quam me socium[4] ad praedicendum ut[5] cavere- 12 tis venire in Italiam. Functus necessario mihi officio, et quodam modo liberata atque exonerata fide mea, quid ultra facere possum quam uti deos deasque precer ut vos et vestrae rei publicae et nobis sociis atque amicis, qui ex vobis pendemus, consulatis?"

XIV. Haec oratio movit patres conscriptos. Ceterum in praesentia nihil, praeterquam fuisse in curia regem, scire quisquam potuit: eo silentio clausa curia erat. Bello denique perfecto, quaeque dicta ab rege quaeque responsa essent emanavere.

2 Persei deinde regis legatis post paucos dies senatus datus est. Ceterum praeoccupatis non auribus magis quam animis ab Eumene rege, omnis et de- 3 fensio[6] et deprecatio legatorum respuebatur; et exasperavit animos ferocia[7] nimia Harpali, qui

[1] confudit Fr.: condit V. [2] obnoxia Fr.: ocnoxia V.
[3] vobis tutum aut Fr.: uobis tum haut V.
[4] me socium Fr.: escium V.
[5] praedicendum ut Fr.: praedicendisaut V.
[6] et defensio iteravit V, quae verba alia manus del., signa ∴ ∴ superscribens.
[7] ferocia J. F. Gronovius: ferociaanimai (sic) V.

[1] The aristocratic or pro-Roman parties in the state.

the better[1]; he threw into confusion and turmoil B.C. 172 everything in Thessaly and Perrhaebia by the prospect of abolition of debts,[2] in order that with the band of debtors bound to him he might overthrow the nobility. Since you remained passive and acquiescent while he did this, and he sees that Greece has been surrendered to him by you, he feels assured that before he crosses into Italy no armed man will meet him. How safe or how honourable this is for you is for yourselves to consider; I at least have deemed it to be a disgrace to me that Perseus should come to Italy to bring war before I, your ally, should have come to warn you to be on guard. Having performed my needful task and, so to speak, absolved and acquitted myself of my trust, what more can I do except pray to the gods and the goddesses that you will look after the interests of yourselves and your state, and of us, your allies and friends who depend upon you? "

XIV. This speech made a profound impression upon the conscript Fathers. But at the time no one was allowed to know anything except that the king had been in the senate-house; with such silence was the senate-house closed. Finally, after the war was over, information leaked out as to what the king had said and what response had been made.

Then a few days later an audience before the senate was given to the ambassadors of King Perseus. But the senators' feelings even more than their ears having been prepossessed by King Eumenes, every plea and every excuse of the ambassadors was rejected: and the excessively arrogant demeanour of Harpalus, who was the leader of the embassy,

[2] Cf. Diod. XXIX. xxxvi.

a.u.c. 582

princeps legationis erat. Is velle quidem et laborare dixit regem, ut purganti se nihil hostile dixisse aut
4 fecisse fides habeatur: ceterum si pervicacius causam[1] belli quaeri videat, forti animo defensurum se. Martem communem esse et eventum incertum belli.
5 Omnibus civitatibus Graeciae atque Asiae curae erat, quid Persei legati, quid Eumenes in senatu egisset; et propter adventum eius quem moturum aliquid rebantur, miserant pleraeque civitates alia[2] in 6 speciem praeferentes legatos. Et legatio Rhodiorum . . . aderat Romae, cuius ferox erat nec falsa dicturus princeps,[3] haud dubius quin Eumenes civitatis quoque suae crimina[4] Persei criminibus iunxisset.
7 Itaque omni modo per patronos hospitesque disceptandi cum rege locum in senatu quaerebat. Quod
8 cum non[5] contigisset, libertate intemperanti[6] invectus in regem, quod Lyciorum gentem adversus Rhodios concitasset graviorque Asiae esset quam Antiochus fuisset, popularem quidem neque Asiae[7]
9 ingratam populis—nam eo quoque iam favor Persei

[1] causam Fr.: causam uel causam V.
[2] Warmington conjectures alios alia.
[3] et legatio Rhodiorum erat ac Satyrus princeps Fr.: et legationis Rhodiorum ferox erat nec falsa simulaturus princeps Vahlen: et legatio Rhodiorum aderat Romae, cuius ferox erat nec falsa dicturus princeps H. J. Mueller: et legatio rhodiorum erat hac falsa į(sic) turus princeps V.
[4] suae crimina Vahlen: sua V.
[5] non add. Duker: om. V.
[6] intemperanti J. F. Gronovius: intemperantius V.
[7] quidem neque Asiae Hartel: quidem quidem V.

exasperated their minds. He said that the king B.C. 172 really wished and exerted himself that he should be believed when he pled in his defence that he had neither said nor done anything with hostile intent; but if he saw that a pretext for war was being all too eagerly sought, he would defend himself with resolution. Mars, he said, was impartial, and the result of war uncertain.

All the cities of Greece and Asia were interested in what the ambassadors of Perseus and what Eumenes had said in the senate; and by reason of his coming, which they believed would provoke some action, most of the cities had sent ambassadors alleging this or that as to their errands. [And an embassy of the Rhodians was also present in Rome, the leading man in which was insolent, although what he was to say was not devoid of truth];[1] he felt certain that Eumenes had included some charges against their state too, along with his charges against Perseus. And so in every fashion, through their patrons and Roman hosts, the envoy sought the opportunity to argue with the king in the senate. When this did not fall to his lot, assailing the king with unrestrained violence, because he had stirred up the Lycian people against the Rhodians and because he was more oppressive to Asia than Antiochus had been, he delivered a speech which was ingratiating and not displeasing to the peoples of Asia—for the popularity of Perseus had spread even there—but

[1] The supplement in brackets is that of H. J. Müller (see critical note) and is, like the other supplements which have been suggested, based in part upon Appian, Bel. Mac. xi. 3 (White, Vol. II, p. 33 of the L.C.L.). The ambassador is not named by Appian.

A.U.C. 582 venerat—orationem habuit, ceterum invisam senatui inutilemque sibi et civitati suae. Eumeni vero conspiratio adversus eum favorem maiorem [1] apud Romanos fecit. Ita omnes ei honores habiti donaque quam [2] amplissima data cum sella curuli atque eburneo scipione.

XV. Legationibus dimissis cum Harpalus, quanta maxima [3] celeritate poterat, regressus in Macedoniam nuntiasset regi, nondum quidem parantes bellum reliquisse se Romanos, sed ita infestos ut facile appareret non dilaturos, et ipse, praeterquam quod et ita credebat futurum, iam etiam volebat, in flore virium se credens esse. Eumeni ante omnes infestus erat; a cuius sanguine ordiens [4] bellum, Euandrum Cretensem, ducem auxiliorum, et Macedonas tres assuetos ministeriis [5] talium facinorum ad caedem regis subornat litterasque eis dat ad Praxo hospitam, principem auctoritate et opibus Delphorum. Satis constabat Eumenem, ut sacrificaret Apollini, Delphos escensurum. Praegressi cum Euandro insidiatores nihil aliud ad peragendum inceptum quam loci opportunitatem, omnia circumeuntes, quaerebant. Escendentibus ad templum a Cirrha, priusquam perveniretur ad frequentia aedificiis loca, maceria erat ab laeva ad [6] semitam paulum extantem a fundamento, qua singuli transirent; dextra pars labe terrae in ali-

[1] maiorem add. Hertz: om. V.
[2] quam Fr.: cuiquam V.
[3] quanta maxima Muretus: quantexima V.
[4] ordiens Fr.: oriens V.
[5] ministeriis Fr.: ministris V. [6] ad add. Madvig: a V.

[1] The attacks of Perseus and the Rhodians were regarded by the Romans as concerted.

was offensive to the senate and useless to the Rhodians and their state. But the conspiracy[1] against Eumenes won for him greater favour with the Romans. And so all honours were conferred upon him and the most generous gifts were bestowed upon him, together with a curule chair and an ivory sceptre. B.C. 172

XV. After the embassies had been dismissed, when Harpalus with all possible speed had returned to Macedonia and reported to the king that he had left the Romans not yet, indeed, preparing for war, but so unfriendly that it was easily evident that they would not try to delay it, then Perseus likewise, not to mention the fact that he believed that this would be the outcome, was now even eager for war, believing that he was at the height of his power. He was more specially incensed at Eumenes; beginning the war with an attempt on his life, he employed Evander the Cretan, a commander of auxiliaries, and three Macedonians who were accustomed to the performance of such crimes, to murder the king, and he gave them a letter to his friend Praxo, a woman high in influence and wealth at Delphi. It was generally known that Eumenes was intending to go up to Delphi to offer sacrifices to Apollo. The plotters, led by Evander, going in advance and carefully reconnoitering the ground, were searching for nothing else than a suitable place at which to accomplish their purpose. As travellers ascend to the temple from Cirrha, before they reach the districts where buildings abound, there was a wall on the left beside a path which stood out only a little distance from the lower courses of the wall, where men could only pass in single file; the right side, in consequence of a land-slide, had fallen away

A.U.C. 582

6 quantum altitudinis derupta[1] erat. Post maceriam se abdiderunt gradibus adstructis, ut ex ea velut e
7 muro tela in praetereuntem conicerent. Primo a mari circumfusa turba amicorum ac satellitum procedebat, deinde extenuabant paulatim angustiae
8 agmen. Ubi ad eum locum ventum est qua singulis eundum erat, primus semitam ingressus Pantaleon, Aetoliae princeps, cum quo institutus regi[2] sermo erat.
9 Tum insidiatores exorti saxa duo ingentia devolvunt, quorum altero caput ictum est regi, altero umerus;
10 sopitusque ex semita procidit[3] in declive, multis super prolapsum iam saxis congestis. Et ceteri quidem, etiam amicorum et satellitum turba,[4] postquam cadentem videre, diffugiunt; Pantaleon contra[5] impavidus mansit ad protegendum regem.

XVI. Latrones, cum brevi circumitu maceriae decurrere ad conficiendum saucium possent, velut perfecta re in iugum Parnasi refugerunt eo cursu ut, cum unus non facile sequendo per invia atque ardua moraretur fugam eorum, ne[6] ex comprenso
2 indicium emanaret, occiderint comitem. Ad corpus regis primo amici, deinde satellites ac servi con-
3 currerunt; tollentes sopitum[7] volnere ac nihil sentientem, vivere tamen ex calore et spiritu remanente in praecordiis senserunt: victurum exigua ac prope
4 nulla spes erat. Quidam ex satellitibus secuti

[1] derupta Duker: diruta V.
[2] regi ed. Vascosana: regis V.
[3] ex semita procidit Gitlbauer: exemita procliuit V.
[4] turba add. Hartel: om. V.
[5] contra Kreyssig: constar V.
[6] ne add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[7] sopitum Fr.: oppidum V.

to a considerable depth. They concealed themselves B.C. 172 behind the wall, building up steps so that they might hurl their missiles, as from a rampart, upon the king as he passed. At first he approached from the sea surrounded by a crowd of his friends and courtiers, then the narrowness of the road gradually thinned out the line. When they came to that place where they had to walk in single file, the first to enter the path was Pantaleon, a leading citizen of Aetolia, with whom the king had begun a conversation. Then the plotters, springing up, rolled down two huge stones, one of which struck the king's head, the other his shoulder; and being stunned he fell from the path down the slope, and many stones were heaped upon him as he now lay prostrate. And the rest, even the crowd of his friends and courtiers, scattered after they saw his fall; Pantaleon on the other hand courageously remained to defend the king.

XVI. The assassins might have made a short detour around the end of the wall and have run down to kill the wounded man, but, as if their task was completed, they fled toward the ridge of Parnassus with such speed that when one of them, finding it difficult to keep up with the others on the pathless and difficult ground, was delaying their escape, they in order that no information might be got from him in case he were caught, killed him, their companion. First the king's friends, then his courtiers and slaves, gathered around his body; lifting him up, still stunned by the blow and unconscious, they nevertheless, from the warmth and the breath which remained in his chest, perceived that he was alive; there was slight hope—almost no hope at all—that he would recover. Some of the courtiers, following latronum vestigia, cum usque ad iugum Parnasi nequiquam fatigati pervenissent, re infecta redierunt. 5 Aggressi facinus Macedones ut non [1] inconsulte ita audacter, coeptum nec consulte et timide reliquerunt. 6 Compotem iam sui regem amici postero die deferunt ad navem; inde Corinthum, ab [2] Corintho per Isthmi 7 iugum navibus traductis, Aeginam traiciunt. Ibi adeo secreta eius curatio fuit, admittentibus neminem, 8 ut fama mortuum in Asiam perferret. Attalus quoque celerius quam [3] dignum concordia fraterna erat credidit; nam et cum uxore fratris et praefecto arcis tamquam iam haud dubius regni heres est 9 locutus. Quae postea non fefellere Eumenen; et quamquam dissimulare et tacite habere et [4] pati statuerat, tamen in primo congressu non temperavit, quin uxoris petendae immaturam [5] festinationem fratri obiceret. Romam quoque fama de morte Eumenis perlata est.

A.U.C. 582

XVII. Sub idem tempus C. Valerius ex Graecia, qui legatus [6] ad visendum statum regionis eius speculandaque consilia Persei regis ierat,[7] redit, con-

[1] non add. Heusinger: om. V.
[2] ab Kreyssig: ad V.
[3] celerius quam Fr.: ceteriumquam V.
[4] et Weissenborn: id V.
[5] immaturam Weissenborn: maturam V.
[6] qui legatus Fr.: legatus qui V.
[7] ierat Vahlen: eiuserat V.

[1] Ships were hauled across the Isthmus on a roadway.

the trail of the murderers, when, wearying themselves in vain, they had reached the ridge of Parnassus, returned without accomplishing anything. The Macedonians, although they planned their crime not injudiciously and boldly, yet abandoned their undertaking injudiciously and cravenly. The next day the king, having recovered consciousness, was carried aboard ship by his friends; thence they proceeded to Corinth and from Corinth, the ships having been drawn over the ridge of the Isthmus,[1] to Aegina. There his treatment was conducted so secretly, no one being admitted to his presence, that the rumour reached Asia that he was dead. Even Attalus believed it more readily than was worthy of their fraternal harmony; for he conferred with his brother's wife and with the commander of the citadel as if he were now beyond doubt heir to the throne. Later on this did not escape the knowledge of Eumenes; and although he decided to ignore it and pass over it in silence and to endure it, he yet at their first meeting did not refrain from reproaching his brother for his excessive haste to woo his wife.[2] To Rome also the report of the death of Eumenes spread. B.C. 172

XVII. About the same time Gaius Valerius, who had gone to Greece as commissioner to investigate the condition of the region and to enquire into the designs of Perseus,[3] returned from thence,

[2] Stratonice had been childless for over sixteen years: she now became pregnant and in due course bore a son, whom Eumenes, according to Polybius (XXX. 27) had not acknowledged at least five years later, but who subsequently succeeded his legal uncle, Attalus II, as Attalus III. (W. S. Ferguson).

[3] Cf. vi. 5 above.

a.u.c. 582 gruentiaque omnia criminibus ab Eumene adlatis
2 referebat. Simul et adduxerat secum Praxo a Delphis, cuius domus receptaculum latronum fuerat, et L. Rammium Brundisinum, qui talis indicii delator erat.
3 Princeps Brundisi Rammius fuit; hospitioque[1] et duces Romanos omnes et legatos, exterarum quoque
4 gentium insignes,[2] praecipue regios, accipiebat. Ex eo notitia ei cum absente Perseo fuerat; litterisque spem amicitiae interioris magnaeque inde fortunae facientibus ad regem profectus brevi perfamiliaris[3] haberi trahique magis quam vellet in arcanos
5 sermones est coeptus. Promissis enim ingentibus praemiis petere institit ab eo rex, quoniam duces omnes legatique Romani hospitio[4] eius uti adsuessent, quibus eorum ipse scripsisset, ut venenum
6 dandum curaret. Cuius scire se comparationem plurimum difficultatis et periculi habere; pluribus consciis comparari; eventu praeterea incerto esse ut aut satis efficacia ad rem peragendam aut[5] tuta ad
7 rem celandam dentur. Se daturum quod[6] nec in dando nec datum ullo signo deprendi[7] posset.
8 Rammius veritus ne, si abnuisset, primus ipse veneni experimentum esset, facturum pollicitus proficiscitur;

[1] hospitioque Weissenborn: hospitioquoque V.
[2] insignes Fr.: insignisquoque V.
[3] perfamiliaris Fr.: perfamiliam V
[4] hospitio Fr.: hostio V.
[5] aut Fr.: ad V.
[6] quod Fr.: que V.
[7] deprendi Fr.: defendi V.

and his reports agreed in all respects with the charges B.C. 172 brought by Eumenes. At the same time, too, he had brought with him Praxo from Delphi, whose house had been the shelter of the assassins, and Lucius Rammius of Brundisium, who was the bearer of the following information. Rammius was a prominent citizen of Brundisium, and he entertained hospitably all Romans, both generals and ambassadors, as well as distinguished personages of foreign states and especially members of princely houses. In consequence he had formed an acquaintance with Perseus, though he was far away; and when a letter roused in him the hope of a more intimate friendship and of great prosperity as a result, he went to visit the king and in a short time began to be regarded as his confidant and to be drawn into his secret conferences to a greater degree than he desired. For by the promise of great rewards the king began to ask of him, since all the Roman generals and ambassadors were accustomed to avail themselves of his hospitality, that he should undertake to poison those about whom Perseus should communicate with him by letter. The king said that he was aware that to obtain poison involved a great deal of trouble and risk; that it was prepared with too many persons sharing in the secret; moreover, that its administration was uncertain, whether doses were sufficiently powerful to accomplish the purpose or sufficiently safe to keep the act concealed. He promised that he would supply a poison which could not be detected by any symptom, either while being given or after it was given. Rammius, fearing that if he refused he himself would be the first to be a test of the poison, promised that he would do as the king nec Brundisium ante redire quam convento C. Valerio legato, qui circa Chalcidem esse dicebatur, 9 voluit. Ad eum primum indicio delato, iussu eius[1] Romam simul venit. Introductus in curiam quae acta erant exposuit.

A.U.C. 582

XVIII. Haec ad ea quae ab Eumene delata erant accessere, quo maturius hostis Perseus iudicaretur, quippe quem non iustum modo apparare[2] bellum regio animo, sed per omnia clandestina grassari scelera latrociniorum ac veneficiorum cernebant. 2 Belli administratio ad novos consules reiecta est; in praesentia tamen Cn. Sicinium praetorem, cuius inter cives et peregrinos iurisdictio erat, scribere 3 milites placuit, qui Brundisium ducti[3] primo quoque tempore Apolloniam in Epirum traicerentur ad occupandas maritimas urbes, ubi consul cui provincia Macedonia obvenisset, classem appellere tuto et 4 copias per commodum exponere posset. Eumenes, aliquamdiu Aeginae retentus periculosa et difficili curatione, cum primum tuto potuit, profectus Pergamum, praeter pristinum odium recenti etiam scelere 5 Persei stimulante summa[4] vi parabat bellum. Legati eo ab Roma gratulantes[5] quod e tanto periculo evasisset venerunt.

6 Cum Macedonicum bellum in annum dilatum esset, ceteris praetoribus iam in provincias profectis, M.

[1] eius Fr.: eiussu V.
[2] apparare Fr.: appellare V.
[3] ducti Fr.: ducit V.
[4] summa add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] gratulantes Fr.: stimulantes V.

wished and departed; nor did he wish to return B.C. 172 to Brundisium until he had met Gaius Valerius, who was said to be in the neighbourhood of Chalcis. Having first given him this information, by the order of Valerius he came with him to Rome. Being introduced into the senate, he reported what had occurred.

XVIII. These revelations, added to those which Eumenes had given, brought to pass a speedier declaration that Perseus was an enemy, since they saw that he was not merely preparing a regular war, as a king should, but was also perpetrating crimes of brigandage and poisoning by all sorts of secret means. The conduct of the war was referred to the next consuls; for the present however, it was decided that Gnaeus Sicinius, the praetor who exercised jurisdiction over cases between citizens and aliens, should enlist troops who should be conducted as rapidly as possible to Brundisium and thence be transported to Apollonia in Epirus as garrisons for the cities on the coast, where the consul to whose lot the province of Macedonia should have fallen might safely put in with his fleet and conveniently disembark his troops. Eumenes, who had been detained for some time at Aegina by a dangerous and difficult course of treatment, setting out for Pergamum as soon as he could safely, was preparing for war with the greatest energy, this fresh attack by Perseus, in addition to his former hatred, urging him on. Ambassadors from Rome came there bringing congratulations because he had escaped from so great a danger.

When the Macedonian war had been put off for a year and the other praetors had already set out for

A.U.C. 582

Iunius et Sp. Lucretius, quibus Hispaniae provinciae obvenerant, fatigantes [1] saepe idem petendo senatum, tandem pervicerunt ut supplementum sibi ad exercitum daretur: tria milia peditum, centum et quin-
7 quaginta equites in Romanas legiones scribere,[2] in socialem exercitum quinque milia peditum et trecentos equites imperare sociis iussi. Hoc copiarum in Hispanias cum praetoribus novis portatum est.

XIX. Eodem anno, quia per recognitionem [3] Postumi consulis magna pars agri Campani, quem privati sine discrimine passim possederant, recuperata in publicum erat, M. Lucretius tribunus plebis promulgavit ut agrum Campanum censores fruendum
2 locarent, quod factum tot annis post [4] captam Capuam non fuerat, ut in vacuo vagaretur cupiditas privatorum.

3 Cum in [5] expectatione senatus esset bello etsi non indicto, tamen iam decreto, qui regum suam, qui Persei [6] secuturi amicitiam essent, legati Ariarathis puerum filium regis secum adducentes Romam
4 venerunt; quorum oratio fuit regem educendum filium Romam misisse, ut iam inde a puero assuesceret
5 moribus Romanis hominibusque. Petere ut eum non sub hospitum modo privatorum custodia, sed publicae
6 etiam curae ac velut tutelae vellent esse. Et regis [7]

[1] fatigantes Kreyssig: fatigatis V.
[2] scribere add. Crévier: om. V.
[3] recognitionem Fr.: secognitionem V.
[4] post Fr.: non post V.
[5] in add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] qui Persei Madvig: perseiqui V.
[7] regis Fr.: regem et V.

---

[1] Cf. i. 6 above and the note.

their provinces, Marcus Junius and Spurius Lucretius, B.C. 172 to whose lots the Spanish provinces had fallen, after wearying the senate again and again by the same request, at length succeeded in having reinforcements voted to them for the army: they were directed to enlist three thousand infantry and one hundred and fifty cavalry for the Roman legions, and for the allied army five thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry. These troops were transported to the two Spains with the new praetors.

XIX. This same year, since as a result of the investigation conducted by the consul Postumius a great part of the Campanian land, which private individuals had occupied without making due distinction of boundaries, had been recovered for the state, Marcus Lucretius, tribune of the people, published a measure providing that the censors should issue leases for the use of the Campanian land, which had not been done for so many years after the fall of Capua that the greed of private citizens had a free field in which to wander.[1]

While the senate was in a state of expectancy (the war having already been determined upon even though not formally declared) as to which kings would follow their friendship and which that of Perseus, ambassadors from King Ariarathes came to Rome, bringing with them his young son: their message was that the king sent his son to Rome to be brought up, to the end that even from boyhood he might be accustomed to Roman manners and men. He asked the Romans to receive him, not only under the care of citizens of private station who were his hosts, but as it were under the care and guardianship of the state. The king's embassy was pleasing to legatio grata senatui fuit; decreverunt ut Cn. Sicinius praetor aedes instruendas[1] locaret ubi filius regis comitesque eius habitare recte[2] possent. Et Thracum legatis, Maedis[3] Cepnatisque et Astis[4] societatem amicitiamque petentibus et quod petebant datum est, et munera binum[5] milium aeris[6] in 7 singulos missa. Hos utique populos, quod ab tergo Macedoniae Thracia esset, adsumptos in societatem gaudebant. Sed ut in Asia quoque et insulis explorata omnia essent, Ti. Claudium Neronem M. 8 Decimium legatos miserunt. Adire eos Cretam et Rhodum iusserunt, simul renovare amicitiam, simul speculari, num sollicitati animi sociorum ab rege Perseo essent.

A.U.C. 582

XX. In suspensa civitate ad expectationem novi belli, nocturna tempestate columna rostrata in Capitolio bello Punico priore posita ob victoriam M. Aemilii[7] consulis, cui collega Ser. Fulvius fuit, tota ad imum fulmine discussa est. Ea res prodigii loco 2 habita ad senatum relata est; patres et ad[8] haruspices 3 referri et decemviros adire libros iusserunt. Decemviri lustrandum oppidum, supplicationem obsecra-

[1] instruendas Lentz: instructas V.
[2] recte Madvig: rec V.
[3] Maedis Madvig: sedis V.
[4] Astis H. J. Mueller: satis V.
[5] binum add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] aeris Duker: aeris summae V.
[7] priore . . . Aemilii add. Madvig: om. V.
[8] ad add. Fr.: om. V.

[1] These states were among the Thracian peoples who were not under Macedonian control. Since they lay to the east of Macedonia, they were, from the Roman standpoint, in its rear.

the Senate; they decreed that Gnaeus Sicinius the B.C. 172
praetor should contract for the rental of a house where the prince and his retinue could suitably reside. When ambassadors of the Thracians, the Maedi, the Cepnati, and the Asti,[1] sought an alliance and friendship, their request was granted and in addition gifts of two thousand asses were presented to each. The Romans were glad that these peoples particularly had joined the alliance because Thrace lay in the rear of Macedonia. But, in order to have full information regarding Asia and the islands also, they sent Tiberius Claudius Nero and Marcus Decimius as commissioners. The senate directed them to visit Crete and Rhodes, partly to renew friendships, partly to ascertain whether the sympathies of the allies had been excited by King Perseus.

XX. In a city which was at the highest pitch of excitement about the new war, during a storm at night the columna rostrata[2] which had been set up on the Capitoline in the first Punic war in honour of the victory of the consul Marcus Aemilius, whose colleague was Servius Fulvius, was completely destroyed by lightning. This event was regarded as a prodigy and was referred to the senate; the Fathers ordered that the matter should be referred to the haruspices and, moreover, that the decemvirs should consult the Books. The decemvirs reported back that the city should be purified, that a period of supplication and prayer should be held and that

[2] This column, which was adorned with the beaks (rostra) of captured ships, dated from the year 254 B.C. The similar column of Duilius, a copy of which is preserved, stood in the Forum. There seems to be no further mention of the columna Aemilia.

A.U.C. 582

tionemque habendam, victimis[1] maioribus sacrificandum et in Capitolio Romae et in Campania ad Minervae promunturium renuntiarunt; ludos per decem dies Iovi optimo maximo primo quoque die
4 faciendos. Ea omnia cum cura facta. Haruspices in bonum versurum id prodigium, prolationemque finium et interitum perduellium portendi responderunt, quod ex hostibus spolia fuissent ea
5 rostra, quae tempestas disiecisset.[2] Accesserunt quae cumularent religiones animis: Saturniae nuntiatum erat sanguine per triduum in oppido pluvisse; Calatiae asinum tripedem natum, et taurum cum quinque vaccis uno ictu fulminis[3] exanimatos;
6 Auximi terra pluvisse. Horum quoque prodigiorum causa res divinae factae et supplicatio unum diem feriaeque habitae.

XXI. Consules ad id tempus in provinciam non exierant, quia neque, uti de M. Popilio referrent senatui obsequebantur, et nihil aliud decernere prius
2 statutum patribus erat. Aucta etiam invidia est Popili litteris[4] quibus iterum cum Statellatibus Liguribus proconsul pugnasse se scripsit ac sex milia eorum occidisse; propter cuius iniuriam belli ceteri
3 quoque Ligurum populi ad arma ierunt. Tum vero non absens modo Popilius, qui deditis contra ius ac fas[5] bellum intulisset et[6] pacatos ad rebellandum[7]

[1] victimis Fr.: uictissimus oppidis V.
[2] disiecisset Fr.: diiecisset V.
[3] fulminis Fr.: fluminis V.
[4] litteris Novák: litteris eius V.
[5] fas Fr.: tam V.
[6] et add. Fr.: om. V.
[7] rebellandum Gruter: rebellinum V.

[1] The narrative continues from x. 15 above.

sacrifices of full-grown victims should be offered both B.C. 172 on the Capitoline at Rome and in Campania at the promontory of Minerva; further, that at the earliest possible moment games for ten days should be celebrated in honour of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. All these directions were scrupulously obeyed. The haruspices pronounced that this omen would turn out for the best, and that an extension of frontiers and the destruction of the enemy were foretold, because those beaks which the storm had overthrown had been spoils taken from the enemy. Other occurrences also increased their concern to appease the gods: news had been brought that at Saturnia there were showers of blood in the town on three successive days; that at Calatia an ass with three feet was born and a bull with five cows was killed by a single bolt of lightning; that at Auximium a shower of earth had fallen. By reason of these prodigies also sacrifices were offered and a day of prayer and a festival were celebrated.

XXI. The consuls up to this time had not set out to their province [1] because they would not yield to the senate in passing a decree regarding Marcus Popilius, and the Fathers were determined to allow no other decree to have precedence over it. The ill-will against Popilius was increased again by dispatches in which he reported that as proconsul he had fought a second time with the Ligurian Statellates and had killed six thousand of them; because of the injustice done in this war the rest of the Ligurian peoples also took up arms. Then indeed not the absent Popilius alone was reproached in the senate because he had made war on surrendered tribes contrary to justice and right, and had roused incitasset, sed consules, quod non exirent in provin-

A.U.C. 582

4 ciam, in senatu increpiti. Hoc consensu patrum accensi M. Marcius Sermo et Q. Marcius Scilla, tribuni plebis, et consulibus multam se dicturos nisi in provinciam exirent denuntiarunt, et rogationem, quam de Liguribus deditis promulgare in animo
5 haberent, in senatu recitarunt. Sanciebatur ut qui ex Statellis deditis in libertatem restitutus ante kal. Sextiles primas non esset, cuius dolo malo is in servitutem venisset, ut iuratus senatus decerneret, qui eam rem quaereret animadverteretque. Ex auctoritate deinde senatus eam rogationem promul-
6 garunt. Priusquam proficiscerentur consules, C. Cicereio, praetori [1] prioris anni, ad aedem Bellonae
7 senatus datus est. Is expositis quas in Corsica res gessisset postulatoque frustra [2] triumpho, in monte Albano, quod iam in morem venerat, ut sine publica
8 auctoritate fieret, triumphavit. Rogationem Marciam de Liguribus magno consensu plebes scivit iussitque.[3] Ex eo plebiscito C. Licinius praetor consuluit senatum, quem quaerere ea rogatione vellet. Patres ipsum eum quaerere iusserunt.

[1] praetori add. Fr.: om. V.
[2] frustra Fr.: frus V.
[3] plebes scivit iussitque Fr.: plebis ciuitati iussitique (sic) V.

---

[1] Cf. XXVI. xxxiii. 14, XXX. xl. 12. On each of these occasions the matter seems to have been referred by the popular assembly to the senate "with power"; since the senate was in theory only an advisory body (and had on occasion been hostile to the commons), the oath perhaps was meant to bind the senators to the utmost scrupulousness and impartiality in making these delegated and final decisions.

[2] Cf. vii. 1–2 above.

[3] This statement cannot be verified from Livy's narrative, pacified people to rebellion, but the consuls as well, B.C. 172 because they did not go to their province. Prompted by this harmony among the Fathers, Marcus Marcius Sermo and Quintus Marcius Scilla, tribunes of the people, first proclaimed that they would lay a fine upon the consuls if they should not go to their provinces, and then read in the senate the motion which they proposed to offer regarding the surrendered Ligurians. It was proposed that in case anyone of the surrendered Statellans had not been restored to liberty before the Kalends of August following, the senate should decree on oath [1] what officials should investigate this matter and punish the person by whose malice the aforesaid person had become a slave. Then, on the authorization of the senate, they published this decree. Before the consuls set out, an audience before the senate was granted to Gaius Cicereius, praetor of the preceding year, in the temple of Bellona. When he had set forth his achievements in Corsica [2] and had vainly demanded a triumph, he celebrated his triumph on the Alban Mount, which had now become customary [3] in order to permit the celebration of a triumph without the authorization of the state. The plebeian assembly voted and ordered the Marcian proposal regarding the Ligurians with complete unanimity. In accordance with this legislation the praetor Gaius Licinius consulted the senate as to whom they would choose to investigate under that bill. The Fathers ordered Licinius himself to conduct the investigation.

in which no triumph in monte Albano has been mentioned since XXXIII. xxiii. 8. In that passage, the triumphing consul cites the precedent of "many famous men," but Livy mentions only one, XXVI. xxi.

A.U.C. 582

XXII. Tum demum consules in provinciam profecti
2 sunt exercitumque a M. Popilio acceperunt.[1] Neque tamen M. Popilius reverti Romam audebat, ne causam diceret adverso senatu, infestiore populo, apud praetorem, qui de quaestione in se proposita[2]
3 senatum consuluisset. Huic detractationi[3] eius tribuni plebis alterius rogationis denuntiatione occurrerunt ut, si non ante idus Novembres in urbem Romam introisset, de absente eo C. Licinius statueret
4 ac iudicaret. Hoc tractus vinculo cum redisset,
5 ingenti cum invidia in senatum venit. Ibi cum laceratus iurgiis multorum esset, senatus consultum factum est ut qui Ligurum post Q. Fulvium[4] L. Manlium consules hostes non fuissent, ut eos C. Licinius Cn. Sicinius praetores in libertatem restituendos curarent, agrumque iis trans Padum consul C.
6 Popilius daret. Multa milia hominum hoc senatus consulto restituta in libertatem, transductisque Padum
7 ager est assignatus. M. Popilius rogatione Marcia bis apud C. Licinium causam dixit; tertio praetor, gratia consulis absentis et Popiliae[5] familiae precibus victus, idibus[6] Martiis adesse reum iussit, quo die novi magistratus inituri erant honorem, ne diceret ius

[1] acceperunt J. F. Gronovius: ceperunt V.
[2] proposita Drakenborch: positam V.
[3] detractationi Bekker: detractioni V.
[4] post Q. Fulvium Fr.: postquam fluuium V.
[5] Popiliae Fr.: popillio V.
[6] victus idibus Fr.: uictulaudibus V.

---

[1] B.C. 179, cf. XL. xliii. 4. The senate reversed itself by this action; previously it had granted triumphs, XL. lix. 1–3, XLI. xiii. 6–8, but now implied that these campaigns had been irregular.

XXII. Then at last the consuls set out for their B.C. 172 province and took over the army from Marcus Popilius. The ex-consul, however, did not dare to return to Rome for fear of having to stand his trial, in the face of an unfriendly senate and still more hostile commons, before the praetor who had put to the senate the question of the investigation directed against him. This reluctance of his was met by the threat of another decree sponsored by the tribunes of the people, to the effect that if Popilius did not enter Rome before the thirteenth of November, Gaius Licinius was to determine the facts and pass judgment in his absence. When he returned, dragged home by this fetter, he came before the senate amid great ill-feeling. After he had been assailed there by the attacks of many, a resolution of the senate was passed that those Ligurians who had not been enemies since the consulship of Quintus Fulvius and Lucius Manlius [1] should be restored to freedom under the supervision of the praetors Gaius Licinius and Gnaeus Sicinius, and should be given land across the Po by the consul Gaius Popilius. Many thousand persons were restored to freedom by this resolution of the senate, and after they had been led across the Po, land was allotted to them. Marcus Popilius twice stood trial before Gaius Licinius in accordance with the Marcian decree ; [2] on the third occasion the praetor, overcome by the influence of the absent consul and the entreaties of the house of Popilius, ordered the defendant to appear on the fifteenth of March, the day on which the new magistrates were to enter upon their offices, so that Licinius himself, [2] Cf. above, xxi. 8. Normal proceedure required three days in court for each trial.

A.U.C. 582

8 qui privatus futurus esset. Ita rogatio de Liguribus arte fallaci elusa est.

XXIII. Legati Carthaginienses eo tempore Romae erant et Gulussa, filius Masinissae. Inter eos 2 magnae contentiones in senatu fuere. Carthaginienses querebantur, praeter agrum de quo ante legati ab Roma, qui [1] re praesenti cognoscerent, missi essent, amplius septuaginta oppida castellaque agri Carthaginiensis biennio proximo Masinissam vi [2] atque armis possedisse: id illi, cui nihil pensi sit, facile 3 esse. Carthaginienses foedere illigatos silere; pro- 4 hiberi enim extra fines [3] efferre arma; quamquam sciant in suis finibus, si inde Numidas pellerent,[4] se gesturos bellum, illo haud ambiguo capite foederis deterreri quo diserte vetentur cum sociis populi 5 Romani bellum gerere. Sed iam ultra superbiam crudelitatemque et avaritiam eius non pati posse Carthaginienses. Missos esse, se [5] qui orarent senatum, ut 6 trium harum rerum unam ab se impetrari sinerent: ut vel ex aequo inter regem [6] socium populumque Carthaginiensem [7] quid cuiusque esset disceptarent; vel permitterent Carthaginiensibus ut adversus iniusta

[1] in add. Sigonius: om. V.
[2] vi Fr.: queui V.
[3] extrafines bis scrip. V.
[4] pellerent Fr.: pellent V.
[5] se add. H. J. Mueller: om. V.
[6] inter regem Madvig: in V.
[7] Carthaginiensem add. H. J. Mueller: om. V.

[1] On the disputes between Masinissa and the Carthaginians, perhaps including this one, cf. XL. xvii. 1–6, xxxiv. 14, Polybius XXXI. 21, and Appian, Punic Wars, VIII. x. Polybius (loc. cit.) says of previous disputes between these parties that "the Carthaginians always came off second best at Rome, not because they had no right on their side, but because the judges were convinced that it was in their own interest to decide against them" (tr. Paton, L.C.L.).

since he would be a private citizen, need not pass B.C. 173 judgment. Thus the decree about the Ligurians was evaded by trickery.

XXIII. Carthaginian ambassadors were at Rome at that time, and also Gulussa, the son of Masinissa. Between these, great disputes arose before the senate. The Carthaginians complained that, besides the land about which envoys from Rome had previously been sent[1] to review the situation on the ground, more than seventy towns and forts in Carthaginian territory had been siezed by force of arms during the past two years by Masinissa; this was a simple matter for him, since he was wholly reckless. The Carthaginians, enmeshed in the treaty, had kept quiet, said the envoys, for they were forbidden to campaign beyond their own boundaries;[2] for, even though they knew that if they were to drive out the Numidians, they would be fighting within their boundaries, they were discouraged by that quite definite article of the treaty by which they were expressly forbidden to wage war against allies of the Roman people.[3] But now the Carthaginians could no longer endure Masinissa's arrogance, cruelty and greed. They, the envoys, had been sent to beg the senate to grant one of the following three requests: either that the Romans should impartially draw the line between the possessions of their royal ally and those of the Carthaginian people; or that they should permit the Carthaginians to protect themselves by a right-

[1] Cf. XXX. xxxvii. 4, Polybius XV. 18. 4.

[2] One of the conditions of peace which had been imposed upon the Carthaginians by Scipio had been, according to Appian, Punic Wars, VIII. 54, μήτε Μασσανάσσῃ μήτε ἄλλῳ Ῥωμαίων φίλῳ πολεμεῖν, cf. below, xxv. 4.

A.U.C. 582

arma pio iustoque se tutarentur bello; vel ad extremum, si gratia plus quam veritas apud eos valeret, semel statuerent, quid donatum ex alieno
7 Masinissae vellent. Modestius certe daturos eos et se[1] scituros, quid dedissent; ipsum[2] nullum[3] praeterquam suae libidinis arbitrio finem[4] facturum.
8 Horum si nihil impetrarent, et aliquod suum post datam[5] a P. Scipione pacem delictum esset, ipsi
9 potius animadverterent in se. Tutam servitutem se[6] sub dominis Romanis quam libertatem expositam
10 ad iniurias Masinissae malle; perire denique[7] semel ipsis satius esse quam sub acerbissimi[8] carnificis arbitrio spiritum ducere. Sub haec dicta lacrimantes procubuerunt stratique humi non sibi magis misericordiam quam regi[9] invidiam conciliarunt.[10]

XXIV. Interrogari Gulussam placuit quid ad ea[11] responderet, aut, si prius mallet expromere, super 2 qua re Romam[12] venisset. Gulussa neque sibi facile esse dixit de iis rebus agere de quibus nihil mandati a patre haberet, neque patri facile fuisse mandare, cum Carthaginienses nec, de qua re acturi essent, nec omnino ituros se Romam indicaverint.
3 In aede Aesculapi clandestinum eos per aliquot noctes consilium principum habuisse, unde nihil

[1] se add. Hartel: om. V.
[2] ipsum Fr.: quid ipsum V.
[3] nullum Fr.: nullam V.
[4] finem add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] aliquod . . . datam Fr.: aliquam . . . datum V.
[6] servitutem se Fr.: iuuentutem et V.
[7] denique Vahlen: neque V.
[8] acerbissimi Fr.: aceruissimo V.
[9] quam regi Fr.: quereis V.
[10] invidiam conciliaverunt add. Novák: om. V.
[11] ea Fr.: eas V. [12] re Romam Fr.: repraeromam V.

eous and proper war against unjust invasion; or, as a last resort, if favouritism outweighed truth with the Romans, that they should decide once and for all what gift of the possessions of others they wished to be given to Masinissa; the Romans would surely be more moderate in their giving, and the Carthaginians would know what they had given; for the Numidian himself would set no limit except in accordance with his own pleasure. If they were granted none of these requests, and some fault had been incurred by them since the peace granted them by Publius Scipio, let the Romans rather inflict punishment upon them. They preferred a safe slavery under Roman masters to a freedom exposed to the injustices of Masinissa; lastly, it was better for them to perish once than to drag out their existence at the whim of a most bitter torturer. With this speech they prostrated themselves in tears, and as they couched on the ground won as much ill-feeling against the king as pity for themselves. B.C. 172

XXIV. The senate voted to ask Gulussa what he would reply to these charges, or, if he preferred to explain this first, on what business he had come to Rome. Gulussa replied that it was not easy for him to discuss matters on which he had no instructions from his father, nor had it been easy for his father to give instructions, inasmuch as the Carthaginians had not given notice as to what they intended to discuss, or even that they were going to Rome in the first place. They had held a secret council of the leading men in the temple of Aesculapius [1] for several emanasse[1] praeterquam[2] legatos occultis cum mandatis Romam mitti. Eam causam fuisse patri mittendi se Romam, qui deprecaretur senatum ne quid communibus inimicis criminantibus se crederent,[3] quem ob nullam aliam causam nisi propter constantem fidem erga populum Romanum odissent. His utrimque auditis senatus, de postulatis Carthaginiensium consultus responderi ita iussit: Gulussam placere extemplo in Numidiam proficisci et nuntiare patri ut de iis de quibus Carthaginienses querantur legatos quam primum ad senatum mittat denuntietque Carthaginiensibus, ut ad disceptandum veniant. Se alia quae[4] possent Masinissae honoris causa et fecisse et facturos esse; ius gratiae non dare. Agrum qua cuiusque sit possideri velle, nec novos statuere fines, sed veteres observare in animo habere. Carthaginiensibus victis se et urbem et agros concessisse, non ut in pace eriperent per iniuriam, quae iure belli non ademissent.[5] Ita regulus Carthaginiensesque dimissi. Munera ex instituto data utrisque aliaque hospitalia comiter conservata.

[1] Aesculapius is the Graeco-Roman equivalent of the Carthaginian god Esmun; for another alleged secret conference in this temple, cf. XLI. xxii. 2.

A.U.C. 582

XXV. Sub idem tempus Cn. Servilius Caepio Ap. Claudius Cento T. Annius Luscus legati ad res

[1] nihil emanasse add. Drakenborch : om. V.
[2] praeterquam Clericus : praeterea V.
[3] crederent Fr. : Romam V.
[4] alia quae Weissenborn : aliquem V.
[5] ademissent Fr. : admisissent V.

---

[1] By its presiding officer, the City Praetor.

nights, about which no news had leaked out except B.C. 172 that envoys with secret instructions were being sent to Rome. This had been the occasion of his father's sending him to Rome, in order that he might beg the senate not to believe the enemies of both peoples when they brought charges against Masinissa, whom they hated for no other reason than his unwavering loyalty toward the Roman people. After these addresses from both parties, the senate, when questioned [1] on the subject of the requests of the Carthaginians, ordered the following answer to be given: It was the decision of the senate that Gulussa should depart at once for Numidia and report to his father that he should send envoys as soon as possible to the senate to answer the complaints of the Carthaginians, and that he should announce this to the Carthaginians, so that they might come to argue the matter. The senate had done and would do whatever it could to honour Masinissa, but justice it did not hand over to favouritism. It wished land to be in the possession of the rightful owner, and its purpose was not to set new boundaries, but to maintain the old. After conquering the Carthaginians, the Romans had granted them both their city and their territory, not in order to rob them unjustly in peace of what they had not taken under the laws of war. With this reply the prince and the Carthaginians were dismissed. Gifts were given to both embassies according to custom [2] and the other duties of hospitality were courteously observed.

XXV. About the same time there returned Gnaeus Servilius Caepio, Appius Claudius Cento and Titus Annius Luscus, the envoys sent to Macedonia to [1] Cf. above, vi. 11, and the note.

A.U.C. 582

repetendas in Macedoniam renuntiandamque amici-
2 tiam regi missi redierunt; qui iam sua sponte infestum Persei senatum insuper accenderunt, relatis ordine quae vidissent quaeque audissent: vidisse se per omnes urbes Macedonum summa vi parari bellum.
3 Cum ad regem pervenissent, per multos dies conveniendi eius potestatem non factam; postremo, cum desperato iam colloquio profecti essent, tum demum se ex itinere revocatos et ad eum introductos
4 esse. Suae orationis summam fuisse: foedus cum Philippo ictum esse,[1] cum ipso eo post mortem patris renovatum, in quo diserte prohiberi eum extra fines arma efferre, prohiberi socios populi Romani 5 lacessere bello. Exposita deinde ab se ordine, quae ipsi nuper in senatu Eumenen vera omnia
6 et comperta referentem audissent. Samothracae praeterea per multos dies occultum consilium cum 7 legationibus civitatium Asiae regem habuisse. Pro his iniuriis satisfieri senatum aequum censere, reddique sibi res sociisque suis quas contra ius 8 foederis habeat. Regem ad ea primo accensum ira inclementer locutum, avaritiam superbiamque Romanis obicientem frementemque [2] quod alii super

[1] esse cum Madvig: secum V.
[2] frementemque Hertz: frequentem V.

---

[1] A traditional phrase for the first step in breaking off relations and declaring war; for the traditional practice of early Rome of which this is a reminiscence cf. I. xxxii. 5–13; on the revised practice of the times here under discussion cf. XXXVI. iii. 7–12.

[2] The following description of Perseus' attitude does not agree with Livy's account of his diplomacy later (below, chapters xxxvi and xxxix). We may suspect that the latter comes from Polybius, and is more accurate; the account here, demand reparations[1] and denounce the treaty of B.C. 172 friendship with King Perseus. These envoys inflamed the hostility which the senate had felt of its own accord toward Perseus by telling, one after another, the things which they had seen and heard; they had seen, they said, preparations for war going forward with the utmost vigour through all Macedonian cities. When they had come to the court, for many days an opportunity of meeting the king was denied them; finally, when, having actually despaired of a conference, they had departed, then at last they had been recalled from their journey and brought before him. The gist of their speech had been as follows: a treaty had been made with Philip, and renewed with Perseus himself after his father's death, in which he was explicitly forbidden to lead his army beyond his own territory, and also forbidden to assail in war the allies of the Roman people. Next the envoys had explained in detail the whole series of ascertained facts which the Fathers had recently heard Eumenes recount in the senate. Moreover, the king had held at Samothrace for many days a secret conference with embassies from the states of Asia. For these violations, the envoys informed the king, the senate thought it right that reparation be made, and that possessions which the king held contrary to the regulations of the treaty be returned to the Romans and their allies. The king[2] had at first replied to these statements ungraciously, being inflamed with anger, had charged the Romans with greed and arrogance, and had yelled that em-the substance of which appears also in Appian, Macedonian Wars, IX. xi, may be derived from some intensely Roman writer, who wanted to justify the forcing of the war by Rome.

A.U.C. 582

alios legati venirent speculatum[1] dicta factaque sua, quod se ad nutum imperiumque eorum omnia 9 dicere ac facere aequum censerent; postremo multum ac diu vociferatum reverti postero die iussisse:
10 scriptum se responsum dare velle. Tum ita sibi scriptum traditum esse: foedus cum patre ictum ad se nihil pertinere; id se renovari, non quia probaret sed quia in nova possessione regni patienda
11 omnia essent, passum. Novum foedus si[2] secum facere vellent, convenire prius de condicionibus debere; si in animum inducerent,[3] ut ex aequo foedus fieret, et se visurum quid sibi faciendum esset, et illos credere e re publica[4] consulturos.
12 Atque ita se proripuisse, et summoveri e regia omnes coeptos. Tum[5] se amicitiam et societatem renuntiasse.[6] Qua voce eum accensum restitisse atque voce clara denuntiasse sibi ut triduo regni sui decederent
13 finibus. Ita se profectos; nec sibi aut manentibus aut abeuntibus[7] quidquam hospitaliter aut benigne factum.

14 Thessali deinde Aetolique legati auditi. Senatui, ut scirent quam primum quibus ducibus usura res publica esset, litteras mitti consulibus placuit ut uter eorum posset[8] Romam ad magistratus creandos veniret.

XXVI. Nihil magnopere quod memorari attineat,

[1] speculatum Kreyssig: speculati V.
[2] novum foedus si Kreyssig: nouo foedus sęi (sic) V.
[3] inducerent Fr.: inducere V.
[4] credere e re publica Madvig: crede re p(sic) V.
[5] tum Fr.: cum V.
[6] renuntiasse Fr.: senuntiasse V.
[7] manentibus aut abeuntibus Madvig: manent ibi V.
[8] posset J. F. Gronovius: esset V.

bassies kept coming one after another to spy upon his words and actions, because they thought it right that he should do and say everything at their beck and call; finally, after shouting a long wordy harangue, he had ordered them to return the next day, since he wished to give them a reply in writing. Then the following written statement had been given them: the treaty made with Perseus' father was in no way binding on him; he had endured its renewal, not because he approved of it, but because immediately on assuming the kingship he had had to endure anything. If the Romans wished to make a new treaty with him, some agreement as to terms should first be reached; if they could bring themselves to make a treaty on terms of equality, he for his part would see what he should do and they for theirs, he supposed, would take care of the interests of their state. After delivering this message, Perseus had begun to hurry out, and the dismissal of everyone from the palace had begun. Thereupon the envoys had denounced the friendship and alliance. Angered at this utterance, Perseus had stopped and in a loud voice had enjoined upon them to leave the borders of his realm within three days. Accordingly they had set out; no sign of hospitality or courtesy had been shown them during their stay or as they departed. B.C. 172

Next the envoys of the Thessalians and Aetolians were heard. In order that the senate might know as soon as possible what military commanders the state was to use, it was voted that dispatches be sent to the consuls to request that whichever of them could do so should come to Rome for the election of magistrates.

XXVI. The consuls had accomplished for the state

A.U.C. 582

rei publicae eo anno consules gesserant. Magis e re publica visum erat comprimi ac sedari exasperatos Ligures.

2 Cum Macedonicum bellum expectaretur, Gentium quoque, Illyriorum regem, suspectum Issaei[1] legati fecerunt, simul questi fines suos eum depopulatum,[2] simul nuntiantes uno animo vivere Macedonum atque Illyriorum regem; communi consilio parare 3 Romanis bellum; et specie legatorum Illyrios speculatores Romae esse Perse auctore missos ut quid 4 ageretur, scirent. Illyrii vocati in senatum; qui cum legatos se esse missos ab rege dicerent ad purg- 5 anda crimina, si qua de rege Issaei deferrent,[3] quaesitum est, quid ita non adissent magistratum, ut ex instituto loca, lautia acciperent, sciretur denique venisse eos et super qua re venissent?[4] Haesitantibus in responso,[5] ut curia excederent 6 dictum; responsum tamquam legatis qui ut[6] adirent senatum non postulassent, dari non placuit; mittendosque ad regem legatos censuerunt qui nuntiarent quid[7] socii quererentur; senatum existimare non aequum eum facere qui ab sociis 7 suis non abstineret iniuriam. In hanc legationem missi A. Terentius Varro, C. Plaetorius, C. Cicereius.

Ex Asia qui circa socios reges missi erant redierunt

[1] Issaei Madvig: esse V.
[2] q.f.s.e.d. Madvig: quaestione suo secundo populatum V.
[3] d.r.I.d. Madvig: deregessisse different V.
[4] s.q.r.u. Fr.: super de re uenisse V.
[5] in responso Fr.: inrebeusponso V.
[6] qui ut Madvig: ut qui V.
[7] quid Madvig: quis V.

[1] Gentius was not in fact definitely attached to Perseus, cf. below, xxix. 11 and xxxvii. 2.
[2] Cf. XXVIII. xxxix. 19.

during this year nothing which is particularly worth mentioning. It was considered more useful to the state that the thoroughly aroused Ligurians should be restrained and calmed. B.C. 172

While war with Macedonia was awaited, Issaean envoys brought suspicion also on Gentius, king of the Illyrians, both by complaining that he had ravaged their territory, and also by reporting that the Illyrian king was in harmony with the Macedonian; that they were concerting plans for war against the Romans; and that Illyrian spies, ostensibly an embassy, had been sent to Rome at Perseus' suggestion to get information of what was going forward.[1] These Illyrians were called before the senate: when they said that they had been sent by the king as envoys to clear him of any charges which might be brought by the Issaeans, they were asked why in that case they had not approached a magistrate, in order to receive lodging and official entertainment[2] according to custom, and indeed in order that their arrival and their purpose might be known. When they hesitated in their answer, they were bidden to leave the senate-house; the senate refused to reply, as they would to envoys, to men who had not requested to be presented to the senate. It was decided to send envoys to the king to inform him of the complaints made by Rome's allies, with the message that the senate considered that he was acting unjustly in not refraining from wrong to these allies of theirs. On this embassy were sent Aulus Terentius Varro, Gaius Plaetorius and Gaius Cicereius.

From Asia the envoys, who had been sent round to the several allied kings,[3] returned and reported that legati, qui rettulerunt[1] Eumenen Aeginae[2] Antiochum in Syria, Ptolemaeum Alexandriae sese convenisse. Omnes sollicitatos legationibus Persei, sed egregie in[3] fide permanere pollicitosque omnia quae populus Romanus imperasset praestaturos. Et civitates socias adisse: ceteras satis fidas, Rhodios[4] fluctuantes et imbutos Persei consiliis invenisse. Venerant Rhodii legati ad purganda ea quae volgo iactari[5] de civitate sciebant; ceterum senatum iis non prius dari quam novi[6] consules magistratum inissent placuit.

[3] Cf. above, xix. 6.

A.U.C. 582

XXVII. Belli apparatum non differendum censuerunt. C. Licinio praetori negotium datur ut ex veteribus quinqueremibus in navalibus Romae subductis quae possent usui esse reficeret pararetque naves quinquaginta. Si quid ad eum numerum explendum deesset, C. Memmio collegae in Siciliam scriberet ut eas quae in Sicilia naves essent reficeret atque expediret, ut Brundisium primo quoque tempore mitti possent. Socios navales libertini[7] ordinis in viginti et quinque naves ex civibus Romanis C. Licinius praetor scribere iussus; in quinque et viginti parem numerum Cn. Sicinius sociis imperaret; idem praetor peditum octo milia, quadringentos equites[8] ab sociis Latini nominis exigeret. Hunc

[1] rettulerunt Harant: redierunt V.
[2] Aeginae H. J. Mueller: ine (sic) V.
[3] egregie in Fr.: egraeciae V.
[4] Rhodios Madvig: socios V.
[5] purganda ea quae volgo iactari Fr.: purganda eaq. uolgo lactari V.
[6] prius dari quam novi Vahlen: ui V.
[7] libertini Fr.: liberti V.
[8] equites add. Fr.: om. V.

they had met Eumenes at Aegina, Antiochus in Syria and Ptolemy at Alexandria. All had received overtures from the embassies of Perseus but remained nobly loyal and had promised to accomplish everything which the Roman people might command. The envoys had also visited the allied city-states; they had found all of them loyal except Rhodes, which was wavering and steeped in Perseus' plots. Envoys of Rhodes had come to Rome to clear the city of the charges which they knew were generally being bandied about; however, it was decided not to hold a meeting of the senate for them until the new consuls should have entered on their office. B.C. 172

XXVII. The senate decided not to postpone the preparations for war. To Gaius Licinius the praetor was given the task of repairing and making ready fifty of the old quinqueremes which were stored in the ship-yards at Rome [1] and might still be usable. If these were insufficient to make up the number, he was to write to his colleague Gaius Memmius in Sicily to repair and fit out the ships in Sicily, so that they could be sent as soon as possible to Brundisium. Gaius Licinius the praetor was ordered to enroll, from among Roman citizens of the class of freedmen, sailors for twenty-five ships; [2] Gnaeus Sicinius was to order an equal number for twenty-five ships from the allies; the same praetor was to raise eight thousand infantry and four hundred cavalry [3] from the allies of the Latin

[1] For the reverse of this process, cf. XLV. ii. 10.

[2] Cf. XXIV. xi, XXXII. xxiii. 9, XXXVI. ii. 15, XL. xviii. 7.

[3] Smaller numbers for the force which Sicinius actually had in Macedonia are given below, xxxvi. 8 (cf. Zonaras IX. 22).

A.U.C. militem qui Brundisi acciperet atque in Macedoniam
582 mitteret, A. Atilius Serranus, qui priore anno 5 praetor fuerat, deligitur. Cn. Sicinius praetor ut[1] exercitium paratum ad traiciendum haberet, C. Popilio consuli ex auctoritate senatus C. Licinius praetor scribit ut et legionem secundam, quae maxime veterana in Liguribus erat, et ex[2] sociis Latini nominis quattuor milia peditum, ducentos equites idibus Februariis Brundisi adesse iuberet.
6 Hac classe[3] et hoc exercitu Cn. Sicinius provinciam Macedoniam obtinere donec successor veniret iussus, prorogato in annum imperio. Ea omnia quae senatus censuit impigre facta sunt. Duodequadraginta quinqueremes ex navalibus deductae; qui deduceret eas Brundisium, L. Porcius Licinus
8 praepositus; duodecim ex Sicilia missae. Ad frumentum classi exercituique coemendum in Apulium Calabriamque tres legati missi, Sex. Digitius, T. Iuventius, M. Caecilius. Ad omnia praeparata Cn. Sicinius praetor, paludatus ex urbe profectus, Brundisium venit.

XXVIII. Exitu prope anni C. Popilius consul Romam redit aliquanto serius quam senatus[4] censuerat, cui primo quoque tempore magistratus creari, cum tantum bellum immineret, e re publica visum[5]

[1] ut Kreyssig: qui ut V.
[2] ex add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[3] i.h.c. Fr.: h.c.i. V.
[4] senatus add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] e re publica visum Bekker: repulsum V.

[1] The phrase socii Latini nominis has previously been translated "Latin allies" (Foster) and "allies of the Latin confederacy" (Sage). These allies were at this time a class of citizens having no political rights at Rome, but having private send it to Macedonia, Aulus Atilius Serranus, who had been praetor the preceding year, was chosen. In order that Gnaeus Sicinius the praetor should have an army ready to cross over, Gaius Licinius the praetor, on authorization of the senate, wrote to Gaius Popilius the consul to order both the second legion, which was the longest in service in the Ligurian country, and four thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry of the allies of the Latin Name to be at Brundisium on the thirteenth of February. With this fleet and this army Gnaeus Sicinius was instructed to hold the theatre of operations in Macedonia until his successor should arrive, his term of command being prolonged for a year. All these orders voted by the senate were vigorously carried out. Thirty-eight quinqueremes were launched from the ship-yards; Lucius Porcius Licinus was put in command to take them to Brundisium; twelve were sent from Sicily. To purchase grain in Apulia and Calabria for the fleet and army three commissioners were sent, Sextus Digitius, Titus Iuventius, and Marcus Caecilius. Gnaeus Sicinius the praetor set out from Rome in military dress, and on arriving in Brundisium found everything in readiness.

Name.[1] To receive this soldiery at Brundisium and B.C. 172

XXVIII. Almost at the end of the year Gaius Popilius the consul returned to Rome, somewhat later than the senate had advised, for they had thought it to the interest of the state, since so great a war was impending, that magistrates be elected as early as rights (rights of trade and marriage); they lived in selected communities all over Italy, and, in later times, also in the provinces; there was no longer any necessary connection with Latium; these allies were simply Class B citizens.

A.U.C. 582

2 erat. Itaque non secundis auribus patrum auditus est consul, cum in aede Bellonae de rebus in Ligur-
3 ibus gestis dissereret. Succlamationes frequentes erant interrogationesque cur scelere fratris oppressos Ligures in libertatem non restituisset.
4 Comitia consularia in quam edicta[1] erant diem,
5 ante diem duodecimum kal. Martias, sunt habita. Creati consules P.[2] Licinius Crassus, C. Cassius Longinus. Postero die praetores facti C. Sulpicius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Canuleius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallus,[3] C. Caninius Rebilus, L. Villius[4]
6 Annalis. His praetoribus provinciae decretae, duae iure Romae dicendo, Hispania et Sicilia et Sardinia, ut uni sors integra esset quo senatus censuisset. Consulibus designatis imperavit senatus ut qua die
7 magistratum inissent, hostiis[5] maioribus rite mactatis precarentur ut quod bellum populus Romanus in animo haberet gerere ut id prosperum eveniret.
8 Eodem die decrevit senatus C. Popilius consul ludos per dies decem Iovi optimo maximo fieri[6] voveret donaque circa omnia pulvinaria dari, si[7] res publica decem annos in eodem statu fuisset.
9 Ita ut censuerant, in Capitolio vovit consul, ludos

[1] edicta Fr.: deuicta V.
[2] P. add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] Gallus add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] Villius Sigonius: iunius V.
[5] hostiis Fr.: hostibus V.
[6] fieri add. Perizonius: om. V.
[7] si add. Fr.: om. V.

---

[1] On the date of the elections, cf. XXXVIII. xlii. 2, XL. lix. 5.

possible. And so it was in no favourable mood that B.C. 172 the Fathers listened to the consul as in the temple of Bellona he discussed his accomplishments among the Ligurians. There were frequent outcries and questions as to why he had not restored to freedom the Ligurians crushed by his brother's injustice.

The consular elections were held on the day for which they had been proclaimed, the eighteenth of February.[1] The consuls elected were Publius Licinius Crassus and Gaius Cassius Longinus. On the following day there were elected as praetors Gaius Sulpicius Galba, Lucius Furius Philus, Lucius Canuleius Dives, Gaius Lucretius Gallus, Gaius Caninius Rebilus and Lucius Villius Annalis. To these praetors there were assigned as provinces two judgeships in Rome, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia, so that for one there was an unassigned position, at the disposal of the senate.[2] The consuls-elect were instructed by the senate that, on the day of their entering upon their office, they were to pray, after due sacrifice of full-grown victims, that, in the war which the Roman people were intending to wage, the outcome might be favourable. On the same day the senate decreed that Gaius Popilius the consul should vow that games for ten days be dedicated to Jupiter, Greatest and Best, and that gifts be given to all the banquet-tables of the gods [3] if for ten years the state should remain in unchanged fortune. As the senate had decreed, the consul made on the Capitol the vow that games be held and gifts

[2] For such roving commissions, cf. XXXV. xx. 7 (consul), XXXV. xli. 6 (praetor in command of the fleet, area of operations discretionary) XXVII. xxii. 3 and XLIV. xvii. 10.
[3] Cf. XXXVI. ii. 2.

A.U.C. 582 fieri donaque[1] dari quanta ex pecunia decresset senatus, cum centum et quinquaginta non minus adessent. Praeeunte verba Lepido pontifice maximo id votum susceptum est.

10 Eo anno sacerdotes publici mortui L. Aemilius Papus decemvir sacrorum et Q. Fulvius Flaccus 11 pontifex, qui priore anno fuerat censor. Hic foeda morte perit. Ex duobus filiis eius qui tum in Illyrico militabant, nuntiatum alterum mortuum, alterum[2] 12 gravi et periculoso morbo[3] aegrum esse. Obruit animum simul luctus metusque: mane ingressi cubiculum servi laqueo dependentem invenere. Erat opinio post censuram minus compotem fuisse sui; vulgo Iunonis Laciniae iram ob spoliatum 13 templum alienasse mentem ferebant. Suffectus in Aemili locum decemvir M. Valerius Messalla; in Fulvi pontifex Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, oppido adulescens sacerdos, est lectus.

A.U.C. 583 XXIX. P. Licinio C. Cassio consulibus non urbs tantum Roma nec terra Italia, sed omnes reges civitatesque quae in Europa quaeque in Asia erant converterant animos in curam Macedonici ac Romani 2 belli. Eumenen cum vetus odium stimulabat, tum recens ira, quod scelere regis[4] prope ut victima 3 mactatus Delphis esset. Prusias, Bithyniae rex,

[1] donaque Madvig: donarique V.
[2] mortuum alterum add. Weissenborn.
[3] morbo Fr.: morte V.
[4] regis Jacobs: eius V.

---

[1] Burial was refused those who hanged themselves, according to a law which dates from a very early period (Servius on Aeneid XII. 603).
[2] Cf. above, iii.

given from as large an appropriation as the senate, B.C. 173 with a quorum of one hundred and fifty, might decree. Lepidus the chief pontifex dictated the words as this vow was taken.

In this year there died of the priests of the state Lucius Aemilius Papus, of the Board of Ten for Ritual, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the pontifex, who had been censor the year before. He died a disgraceful[1] death. Of his two sons, who were at that time serving in the army in Illyricum, it was reported that one had been killed and one was stricken with a severe and dangerous disease. Grief and fear together overwhelmed the father's mind; slaves who entered his bedroom in the morning found him hanging in a noose. It was thought that after his censorship he was not wholly himself; a common rumour had it that the wrath of Lacinian Juno over the robbing of her temple[2] had unbalanced his mind. In Aemilius' place on the Board of Ten Marcus Valerius Messalla was substituted; in Fulvius' place as pontifex Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, a man quite young for a priesthood, was chosen.

XXIX. In the consulship of Publius Licinius and B.C. 171
Gaius Cassius, not only the city of Rome and the land of Italy, but also all kings and states both in Europe and in Asia, had turned their minds to concern over the war between Macedonia and Rome. Eumenes was urged on by his former enmity and quite as much by his fresh anger, because through the king's crime he had been almost slaughtered like a beast for sacrifice at Delphi.[3] Prusias, the king of Bithynia, [3] Cf. above, xvi. and the note. For the plot against Eumenes as an occasion of the war cf. Polybius XXII. 18 and XXVII. 6.

A.U.C. 583

statuerat abstinere armis et[1] eventum expectare; nam neque Romanos posse aequum censere, adversus fratrem uxoris se[2] arma ferre, et apud Persea victorem veniam per sororem impetrabilem fore. 4 Ariarathes Cappadocum rex, praeterquam quod Romanis suo nomine auxilia pollicitus erat, ex quo est iunctus Eumeni adfinitate, in omnia belli pacisque 5 se consociaverat consilia. Antiochus imminebat quidem Aegypti regno, et pueritiam regis et inertiam tutorum spernens; et ambigendo de Coele Syria 6 causam belli se habiturum existimabat gesturumque id nullo impedimento occupatis Romanis in Macedonico bello; quod ad[3] bellum tamen omnia et per suos legatos senatui et ipse legatis eorum 7 enixe[4] pollicitus erat. Ptolemaeus propter aetatem alieni tum arbitrii erat; tutores et bellum adversus Antiochum parabant, quo vindicarent Coelen Syriam, et Romanis omnia pollicebantur ad Macedonicum 8 bellum. Masinissa et frumento iuvabat Romanos et auxilia cum elephantis Misagenenque filium mittere ad bellum parabat. Consilia autem in omnem 9 fortunam ita disposita habebat: si penes Romanos victoria esset, sua quoque in eodem statu mansura

[1] et add. Vahlen.
[2] se add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[3] ad add. Vahlen: om. V.
[4] enixe Kreyssig: exine V.

---

[1] Cf. above, xii. 3, and Appian, Mithridatic Wars, XII. i. 2.

[2] Cf. XXXVIII. xxxix. 6; on Ariarathes' pro-Romanism, above, xix. 3–6.

[3] Cf. Polybius XXVII. 19; Ptolemy VI Philometor was about 16 at this time, having succeeded to the throne in 181 B.C. His tutors were Eulaeus and Lenaeus; the former is accused of cowardice by Polybius XXVIII. 21.

had determined to refrain from arms and await the B.C. 171 outcome; for, he thought, the Romans for their part could not think it right that he should take up arms against his wife's brother, and, as for Perseus, if he conquered, reconciliation might be effected with him through his sister.[1] Ariarathes, the king of Cappadocia, apart from the fact that he had promised aid directly to the Romans, was from the time of his alliance in marriage with Eumenes in harmony with the latter in all plans for peace or war.[2] Antiochus was indeed threatening the kingdom of Egypt, in scorn of the youth of the king and the sluggishness of his guardians;[3] and he expected, by raising disputes about Hollow Syria,[4] to have a cause for war and to wage it without obstacle while the Romans were busied with the Macedonian war; however, for this war he had zealously promised everything to the senate through his envoys, and personally to the envoys of the senate. Ptolemy because of his age was at that time still under the control of others; his guardians were both preparing war against Antiochus, in order to clear their title to Hollow Syria, and were promising the Romans everything for the war with Macedonia. Masinissa was helping the Romans with grain and was preparing to send to the war troops with elephants under command of his son Misagenes. However, he had plans ready for any outcome, and arranged as follows: if victory should be on the side of the Romans,

[4] The district of Damascus, and extending to the north, between Lebanon and Antilebanon; it had first belonged to Seleucus, was conquered by Ptolemy Philadelphus in 280 and held by Egypt till 218; it was retaken by Antiochus the Great in 201–198, and given by him as dowry for his daughter Cleopatra, mother of the reigning Ptolemy.

A.U.C. 583

esse,[1] neque ultra quidquam movendum; non enim 10 passuros Romanos vim Carthaginiensibus adferri; si fractae essent[2] opes Romanorum, quae tum protege-erent Carthaginienses, suam omnem Africam fore.
11 Gentius rex Illyriorum fecerat potius cur suspectus esset Romanis quam satis statuerat, utram foveret partem impetuque magis quam consilio his aut 12 illis[3] se adiuncturus videbatur. Cotys Thrax Odrys-arum rex clam[4] Macedonum partis erat.

XXX. Haec sententia regibus cum esset de bello, in liberis gentibus populisque plebs[5] ubique omnis ferme ut solet deterioribus erat, ad[6] regem Macedonasque
2 inclinata; principum diversa[7] cerneres studia. Pars ita in Romanos effusi erant ut auctoritatem immodico
3 favore corrumperent, pauci ex iis iustitia imperii Romani capti, plures ita si praecipuam operam navassent potentes sese in civitatibus suis futuros
4 rati. Pars altera regiae adulationis erat; quosdam[8] aes alienum et desperatio rerum suarum eodem manente statu praecipites ad novanda omnia agebat; quosdam ventosum ingenium, quia ad[9] Persea magis
5 aura popularis ierat.[10] Tertia pars, optima eadem

[1] mansura esse Madvig: mansurasse V.
[2] fractae essent Fr.: freta essent V.
[3] his aut illis J. F. Gronovius: iis aut illius V.
[4] clam Gertz: eiad V.
[5] plebs Fr.: gens V.
[6] ad J. F. Gronovius: ob V.
[7] diversa Fr.: aduersa V.
[8] quosdam Gertz: quos V.
[9] ad add. Madvig: om. V.
[10] ierat Madvig: erat V.

[1] As used here, the name covers only the north-western part of the continent.
[2] Cf. above, xxvi. 2.

then his own situation would remain unchanged, B.C. 171
nor should he make any move to expand, for the Romans would not permit violence to be used against the Carthaginians; if the powers of Rome, which then were sheltering the Carthaginians, should be broken, all Africa[1] would be his. Gentius, king of the Illyrians, did not so much determine which side he would favour, as succeed in becoming an object of suspicion to the Romans, and seemed to be about to join the one or the other through impulse more than reasoning.[2] The Thracian Cotys,[3] king of the Odrysae, secretly sided with Macedonia.

XXX. While these were the feelings of the kings about the war, among the free groups and peoples, the commons everywhere were almost all, as usual, for the worse side, being inclined toward the king and the Macedonians; among the leading men one might notice conflicting interests. Some were so enraptured with the Romans as to undermine their own influence by their unrestrained partizanship; a few of them were attracted by the justice of Roman rule, most were moved by the thought that if they displayed some especial service for the Romans they would become powerful in their own states. Another group were toadies to the king; some, because of debt and despair of their own fortunes if no change should occur, were driven headlong to the overturning of everything. Some were upset by their own windy instability of character, since the breeze of popular favour turned in Perseus' direction. A third group, which was also the worthiest et prudentissima, si utique optio domini potioris daretur, sub Romanis quam sub rege malebat esse; 6 si liberum in ea re [1] arbitrium fortunae esset, neutram partem volebant potentiorem altera oppressa fieri, sed illibatis [2] potius viribus utriusque partis pacem ex aequo manere; ita inter utrasque optimam condicionem civitatium fore, protegente altera semper 7 inopem ab alterius iniuria. Haec sentientes certamina fautorum utriusque partis taciti ex tuto spectabant.

[3] Polybius XXVII. 12 speaks highly of Cotys' ability; he was counter-balanced by other Thracians, cf. above, xix. 7; for his help to Perseus, cf. below, li. 10.

A.U.C. 583

8 Consules, quo die magistratum inierunt, ex senatus consulto cum circa omnia fana, in quibus lectisternium maiorem partem anni esse solet, maioribus hostiis immolassent, inde preces suas [3] acceptas ab diis immortalibus ominati, senatui rite sacrificatum precationemque de bello factam renuntiarunt. Haruspices ita responderunt: si quid rei novae 9 inciperetur, id maturandum esse; victoriam, trium- 10 phum, propagationem [4] imperii portendi. Patres, quod bonum faustum [5] felixque populo Romano esset, centuriatis comitiis primo quoque die ferre [6]

[1] in ea re Vahlen: inde V.
[2] illibatis Fr.: inliuatam V.
[3] suas Fr.: suasque V.
[4] propagationem Perizonius: prorogatio V.
[5] imperii . . . faustum add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] quoque die ferre Fr.: diferre V.

[1] Livy's apparent lack of pro-Roman bias at this point probably results from his having taken this material from and wisest,[1] if merely a choice of a dominating superior were offered them, preferred to be under the Romans rather than under the king; but if they had a free choice of destiny in this respect, they wished neither side to become the more powerful through the downfall of the other, but rather that, the strength of both sides being unexhausted, peace on terms of equality should continue; thus the situation of the free states with respect to the two powers would be most advantageous, since one power would always protect the weak against wrongdoing by the other. With these sentiments they watched silently from a safe position the contests of the partisans of either side. B.C. 171

In accordance with a decree of the senate, the consuls, on the day of their inauguration, offered sacrifices of full-grown victims at all the temples in which a banquet for the god is usually spread during the greater part of the year; thereupon, feeling assured that their prayers were approved by the immortal gods, they reported to the senate that due sacrifice and prayer for the war had been made. The diviners [2] gave the following report: If any new enterprise should be begun, it should be speeded on; victory, triumph, and enlargement of the realm were forecast. The Fathers, with the wish that it might be well and of good omen and fortune for the Roman people, instructed the consuls to present on the first possible day to the people, assembled in their Hun-

Polybius, who was active in one of the groups which believed in the balance of power.

[2] These diviners (the Latin term haruspices has previously been used) observed all manner of signs, especially the entrails of sacrificial animals; their art was originally Etruscan (cf. V. xv. 1).

A.U.C. 583

ad populum consules iusserunt ut quod Perseus Philippi filius, Macedonum rex, adversus foedus cum patre Philippo ictum et secum post mortem eius renovatum sociis populi Romani arma intulisset, 11 agros vastasset[1] urbesque occupasset, quodque belli parandi adversus populum Romanum[2] consilia inisset, arma milites classem eius rei causa comparasset, ut, nisi de iis rebus satisfecisset, bellum cum eo iniretur. Haec rogatio ad populum lata est.

XXXI. Senatus consultum inde factum est ut consules inter se provincias Italiam et Macedoniam compararent sortirenturve; cui Macedonia obvenisset, ut is regem Persea quique eius sectam secuti essent, nisi populo Romano satisfecissent, bello 2 persequeretur. Legiones quattuor novas scribi placuit, binas singulis consulibus. Id praecipui[3] provinciae Macedoniae datum quod, cum alterius consulis legionibus[4] quina milia et duceni pedites ex vetere instituto darentur in singulas legiones, in Macedoniam sena milia peditum scribi iussa, equites 3 treceni aequaliter in singulas legiones. Et in sociali

[1] vastasset Fr.: uastaret V.
[2] PR. Fr.: praetorem V.
[3] praecipui Lipsius: praecipue V.
[4] legionibus Fr.: legationibus V.

---

[1] The founding of the comitia centuriata was ascribed to Servius Tullius in 578 B.C. It was the second in age of the Roman assemblies; by this time, it was the older and more dignified of the assemblies actually held, having elective and judicial functions as well as the legislative ones which it shared with the comitia tributa.

[2] A much-mutilated inscription (Dittenberger, Sylloge Inscriptionum Graecarum, 3rd ed. No. 643) has been discovered, containing a letter of the senate to the Delphic Amphictyony, dreds,[1] the resolution that, whereas Perseus, son of B.C. 171

Philip, King of Macedonia, contrary to the treaty made with his father Philip and renewed with himself after the death of his father, had invaded allies of the Roman people, had devastated their land and seized their cities, and whereas he had entered on plans for preparing war against the Roman people, and had assembled arms, soldiers and fleet for the said purpose, resolved that, unless he offered satisfaction in these matters, war against him be undertaken.[2] This resolution was passed by the people.

XXXI. Thereupon a decree of the senate ws passed that the consuls should with each other arrange or draw lots for the districts of Italy and Macedonia, and that the consul to whom Macedonia should fall should attack in war King Perseus and those who took his part, unless they rendered satisfaction to the Roman people. It was voted to enroll four new legions, two for each consul. The special arrangement was made for the district of Macedonia that, although to the legions of the other consul five thousand two hundred infantry per legion were allotted in accordance with old custom, for Macedonia six thousand infantry[3] were ordered to be enrolled and for both forces three hundred cavalry in each legion. Also the number for the force of allies was which has been restored as setting forth the grievances of the Romans against Philip as related here and below by Livy, as well as by other authors.

[3] Cf. XLIII. xii. 3–4 and XLIV. xxi. 8 for the extra strength of these legions; in XXXV. ii. 4, a strength of 6200 is mentioned; however, Polybius (III. cvii. 11 and VI. xx. 8) states that the normal strength of the legion was about 4000 infantry, and emergency strength, about 5000, which suggests that Livy may be using inflated figures here.

A.U.C. 683

exercitu consuli alteri auctus numerus: sedecim milia peditum octingentos equites, praeter eos quos Cn. Sicinius duxisset, sescentos equites, in Macedoniam 4 traiceret. Italiae satis visa duodecim milia sociorum peditum, sescenti equites. Illud quoque praecipuum datum sorti Macedoniae, ut centuriones militesque veteres scriberet quos vellet consul usque ad quin- 5 quaginta annos. In tribunis militum novatum eo anno propter Macedonicum bellum, quod consules ex senatus consulto ad populum tulerunt, ne tribuni militum eo anno suffragiis crearentur, sed consulum praetorumque in iis faciendis iudicium arbitriumque 6 esset. Inter praetores ita partita imperia: praetorem, cuius sors fuisset ut iret quo senatus censuisset, 7 Brundisium ad classem ire placuit, atque ibi recognoscere [1] socios navales, dimissisque si qui parum idonei essent, supplementum legere ex libertinis et dare operam ut duae partes civium Romanorum, tertia 8 sociorum esset. Commeatus classi legionibus ut ex Sicilia Sardiniaque [2] subveherentur, praetoribus, qui [3] eas provincias sortiti essent, mandari placuit ut alteras decimas Siculis Sardisque imperarent, quod [4] frumentum ad exercitum in Macedoniam portaretur. 9 Siciliam C. Caninius Rebilus est sortitus, L. Furius Philus Sardiniam, L. Canuleius Hispaniam,[5] C. Sulpicius Galba urbanam iurisdictionem L. Villius [6]

[1] recognoscere Bekker: recognosceret V.
[2] Sardiniaque Fr.: sardinia V.
[3] qui add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] quod Vahlen: utquod V.
[5] L. Canuleius Hispaniam add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] L. Villius Sigonius: c. iulius V.

[1] The election of tribunes of the soldiers had been the rule since 309 B.C. (supra IX. xxx. 3). Later half were elected, half appointed (XLIII. xii. 7 and XLIV. xxi. 2–3).

increased for the one consul; he was to take over to B.C. 171 Macedonia sixteen thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry besides the six hundred cavalry under the command of Gnaeus Sicinius. For Italy twelve thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry of the allies were judged sufficient. The following privilege was also granted to the Macedonian allotment, that the consul might at his discretion enroll former centurions and soldiers up to fifty years of age. In connection with the tribunes of the soldiers, an innovation was made that year because of the Macedonian war, a change brought before the commons by the consuls in accordance with a resolution of the senate, namely, that tribunes of the soldiers should not be chosen by vote for this year but that the consuls and praetors should exercise their judgment and choice in appointing them.[1] Commands were divided among the praetors as follows: it was decided that the praetor whose lot it was to go where the senate determined should go to the fleet at Brundisium and there inspect the sailors; after discharging any who were unfit, he was to enroll replacements from among freedmen, and see to it that two-thirds should be Roman citizens and one-third allies. It was voted to instruct the praetors who should draw Sicily and Sardinia, in order that provisions from these provinces might be conveyed to the fleet and legions, that they should impose a second tithe[2] on the Sicilians and Sardinians, this grain to be transported to the army in Macedonia. Sicily was drawn by Gaius Caninius Rebilus, Sardinia by Lucius Furius Philus, Spain by Lucius Canuleius, the jurisdiction over citizens by Gaius Sulpicius Galba, that over aliens by Lucius Villius Annalis;

[1] Cf. XXXVII. l. 9.

A.U.C. 583 Annalis inter peregrinos; C. Lucretio Gallo, quo senatus censuisset sors obvenit.

XXXII. Inter consules magis cavillatio quam magna contentio de provincia fuit. Cassius sine sorte [1] se Macedoniam optaturum [2] dicebat, nec posse 2 collegam salvo iureiurando secum sortiri. Praetorem eum enim ne [3] in provinciam iret, in contione iurasse se stato loco statisque diebus sacrificia habere quae absente se recte fieri non possent; quae non magis consule quam praetore absente recte fieri posse, 3 si [4] senatus non quid velit in consulatu, potius quam quid in praetura iuraverit P. Licinius, animadvertendum esse censeat; se tamen futurum in senatus potestate. Consulti patres, cui consulatum populus 4 Romanus non negasset, ei [5] ab se provinciam negari superbum rati, sortiri consules iusserunt. P. Licinio 5 Macedonia, C.[6] Cassio Italia obvenit. Legiones inde sortiti sunt: prima et tertia ut [7] in Macedoniam traicerentur, secunda et quarta ut in Italia remanerent.

6 Dilectum consules multo intentiore quam alias cura [8] habebant. Licinius veteres quoque scribebat milites centurionesque; et multi voluntate nomina dabant, quia locupletes videbant, qui priore Macedonico bello aut adversus Antiochum in Asia stipendia

[1] sorte Fr.: forte V.
[2] optaturum Ruben: oppugnaturum V.
[3] eum enim ne Vahlen: eumenien V.
[4] posse si Heller: possent si V.
[5] ei add. Pluygers: om. V.
[6] C. add. Fr.: om. V.
[7] ut add. Wesenberg: om. V.
[8] intentiore . . . cura Kreyssig: intentiorem . . . curam V.

the lot placed Gaius Lucretius Gallus at the senate's B.C. 171 disposal.

XXXII. Between the consuls there was an outburst of sarcasm rather than a great dispute concerning the assignment of their provinces. Cassius said he would choose Macedonia without the lot and that his colleague could not, without perjury, cast lots with him. For when Licinius had been praetor,[1] that he might not have to go to his province, he had sworn before an assembly that he had sacrifices in a fixed place and on fixed days which could not be duly performed in his absence; sacrifices could no more be duly performed in the absence of a consul than in the absence of a praetor, unless the senate thought it best to take notice of Publius Licinius' wishes as consul, rather than of the oath he had taken as praetor; however, said Cassius, he would submit himself to the senate. When the matter was laid before the Fathers, inasmuch as they thought it would be arrogant on their part to withhold a province from the man from whom the Roman people had not withheld the consulship,[2] they ordered the consuls to cast lots. Macedonia fell to Publius Licinius, Italy to Gaius Cassius. Next the legions were allotted; the first and third were to cross to Macedonia, the second and fourth to remain in Italy.

The consuls were conducting the levy with by far more painstaking care than usual. Licinius was also enrolling the veteran soldiers and centurions; likewise many enlisted voluntarily, because they saw that those who had served in the former Macedonian campaign or against Antiochus in Asia had become

[1] Cf. XLI. xv. 10.
[2] For a somewhat similar verdict, cf. XXXII. vii. 11.

A.U.C. 583

fecerant.[1] Cum tribuni militum, qui centuriones scribebant,[2] primum quemque citarent, tres et viginti centuriones qui primos pilos duxerant [3] citati tribunos plebis appellarunt. Duo ex collegio, M.[4] Fulvius Nobilior et M. Claudius Marcellus, ad consules rem [5] reiciebant: eorum cognitionem esse debere, quibus dilectus quibusque bellum mandatum esset; ceteri cognituros se de quo appellati essent aiebant, et si iniuria fieret, auxilium civibus laturos.[6]

XXXIII. Ad subsellia tribunorum res agebatur; eo M. Popilius consularis, advocatus centurionum, et [7] 2 centuriones et consul venerunt. Consule inde postulante ut in contione ea res ageretur, populus in contionem advocatus. Pro centurionibus M. Popilius, qui biennio ante consul fuerat, ita verba 3 fecit: Militares homines et stipendia iusta et corpora et aetate et assiduis laboribus confecta habere,[8] nihil recusare [9] tamen quo minus operam rei publicae dent. Id tantum deprecari, ne inferiores iis ordines quam quos cum [10] militassent habuissent, attri-

[1] fecerant Fr.: ferabant V.
[2] scribebant H. J. Mueller: sed V.
[3] duxerant Fr.: deduxerant V.
[4] ante M., M. fuluius nouiliore inseruit V.
[5] rem add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[6] laturos Fr.: staturos V.
[7] centurionum et add. Hertz: om. V.
[8] habere Fr.: habent L.
[9] recusare Fr.: recusarent V.
[10] cum add. Fr.: om. V.

[1] Former rank was not renewed at re-enlistment; however, it was no doubt taken into account by enlisting officers; this incident may have been a turning-point, as in later times rank was regularly held over on re-enlistment.

rich. When the military tribunes who were appoint- B.C. 171
ing centurions were assigning men as they came,[1] twenty-three veterans who had held the rank of chief centurion [2] on being named appealed to the tribunes of the people. Two of these magistrates, Marcus Fulvius Nobilior and Marcus Claudius Marcellus, referred the matter back to the consuls; for, they said, the investigation belonged to those to whom the levy and the war had been committed; the other tribunes said they would investigate the matter of the appeal, and if wrong was being done, they would come to the aid of their fellow-citizens.

XXXIII. The investigation took place at the benches of the tribunes; thither came Marcus Popilius, the ex-consul, as counsel for the centurions, the centurions themselves, and the consul. At the request of the consul that this investigation take place before an assembly, the people were summoned to an assembly. On behalf of the centurions Marcus Popilius, who had been consul two years before, addressed the people as follows: These soldierly men had ended their regular military service and had also ended their physical vigour because of both age and unremitting labour; however, they offered no objection to contributing their services to the state. This one request they did make, that they should not be assigned ranks lower than those they had held during their regular service.[3] Publius

[2] The forward, or ranking, centurion of the first maniple of the reserve formation (triarii) was so called; it is not certain whether the rear centurion of this maniple (primus pilus posterior) would also be included; duxerant suggests his exclusion. Cf. Polybius VI. 24.

[3] In the army contemplated there were not, however, enough such positions to go around.

A.U.C. 583

4 buerentur.[1] P. Licinius consul senatus consulta[2] recitari iussit, primum, quo bellum senatus Perseo iussisset, deinde, quo veteres centuriones quam plurimos[3] ad id bellum scribi censuisset, nec ulli qui non maior annis quinquaginta esset vacationem
5 militiae esse. Deprecatus est deinde, ne[4] in novo bello, tam propinquo Italiae, adversus regem
6 potentissimum, aut tribunos militum dilectum habentes impedirent, aut prohiberent consulem, quem cuique ordinem assignari e re publica esset, eum assignare. Si quid[5] in ea re dubium esset ad senatum reicerent.

XXXIV. Postquam consul quae voluerat dixit, Sp. Ligustinus, ex eo numero, qui tribunos plebis appellaverant, a consule et ab tribunis[6] petit ut sibi paucis
2 ad populum agere liceret. Permissu omnium ita locutus fertur:

"Sp. Ligustinus Crustumina[7] ex Sabinis sum oriundus, Quirites. Pater mihi iugerum agri reliquit et parvum tugurium, in quo natus educatusque
3 sum, hodieque[8] ibi habito. Cum primum in aetatem veni, pater mihi uxorem fratris sui filiam dedit, quae secum nihil attulit praeter libertatem

[1] habuissent attribuerentur Fr.: habuisset adtribuerunt V.
[2] senatus consulta Crevier: cos. sc. sic V.
[3] plurimos J. F. Gronovius: plurimum V.
[4] ne add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[5] Si quid Fr.: isiquide (sic) V.
[6] tribunis Fr.: tribuno V.
[7] Crustumina Weissenborn: tribus crustimina V.
[8] hodieque Fr.: hodiecumque V.

[1] The district of this tribe lay just north of Rome; it was perhaps a new tribe in 495 B.C., cf. II. xxi. 7.

[2] This was less than the standard minimum of two iugera for landed property; Ligustinus was therefore technically

Licinius the consul ordered to be read the decrees B.C. 171 of the senate, first that in which the senate authorized the war against Perseus, then that in which it resolved that as many former centurions as possible be enrolled for this war, and no exemption from service be granted to anyone under fifty-one years of age. Then he made the request that, in a new war, at so little a distance from Italy, against a very powerful king, the people should not hinder the military tribunes who were holding the levy or prevent the consul from assigning such rank to each man as was to the best interests of the state. If there were any doubtful point in this matter, let them refer it back to the senate.

XXXIV. After the consul had said what he wished, Spurius Ligustinus, one of the men who had appealed to the tribunes of the people, asked of the consul and the tribunes that he be permitted to address a few words to the people. With everyone's permission he is said to have spoken as follows:

"I, Spurius Ligustinus of the tribe of Crustumina,[1] come of Sabine stock, fellow-citizens. My father left me an acre[2] of land and a little hut, in which I was born and brought up, and to this day I live there. When I first came of age, my father gave me as wife his brother's daughter,[3] who brought with her nothing but her free birth and her chastity, and a proletarius, and no doubt needed his military career as a means of livelihood.

[3] Marriage of first cousins was at times not recognized as legal at Rome; it is not clear whether this was a rustic irregularity, or an indication of the lapse of any such impediment at this time. Cf. Cicero, Philippics, II. 99 (Antony made such a marriage), Tacitus, Annals, XII. 6 (regarded as unprecedented), Plutarch, Roman Questions, 6 (a recent innovation).

A.U.C. 583

pudicitiamque, et cum his fecunditatem, quanta vel 4 in diti domo satis esset. Sex filii nobis, duae filiae sunt, utraeque iam nuptae. Filii quattuor togas 5 viriles habent, duo praetextati sunt. Miles sum factus P. Sulpicio C. Aurelio consulibus. In eo exercitu quo in Macedoniam est transportatus, biennium miles gregarius fui adversus Philippum regem; tertio anno virtutis causa mihi T. Quinctius Flamini-
6 nus decimum ordinem hastatum assignavit. Devicto Philippo Macedonibusque cum in Italiam reportati [1] ac dimissi essemus, continuo miles voluntarius cum M.
7 Porcio consule in Hispaniam sum profectus. Neminem omnium imperatorum quo vivant acriorem [2] virtutis spectatorem ac iudicem fuisse sciunt, qui et illum et alios duces longa militia experti sunt. Hic me imperator dignum iudicavit cui primum hastatum
8 prioris centuriae assignaret. Tertio iterum volun-tarius miles factus sum in eum exercitum qui adversus Aetolos et Antiochum regem est missus. A M'.
Acilio [3] mihi primus princeps prioris centuriae est
9 assignatus. Expulso rege Antiocho subactis [4] Aetolis reportati sumus in Italiam; et deinceps bis, quae

[1] reportati Fr.: portati V.
[2] acriorem Fr.: acrioris V.
[3] a M'. Acilio Sigonius: a.m. caelio V.
[4] subactis Fr.: subactolis V.

---

[1] That is, were over sixteen or seventeen; the man's toga, except for senators, was plain white; the boy's had a purple border-stripe.

[2] 200 B.C., cf. XXXI. v. 1.

[3] The advance formation (hastati) was the lowest in rank of the three main subdivisions of the legion, and the tenth maniple the lowest in rank in the formation; from his subsequent status, it seems likely that Ligustinus was given the

with these a fertility which would be enough even B.C. 171 for a wealthy home. We have six sons, and two daughters, both of whom are now married. Four of our sons have assumed the toga of manhood,[1] two wear the boys' stripe. I became a soldier in the consulship of Publius Sulpicius and Gaius Aurelius.[2] In the army which was taken over to Macedonia I served two years as a private soldier against King Philip; in the third year, for my bravery, Titus Quinctius Flamininus made me centurion of the tenth maniple of the advance formation.[3] After the defeat of Philip and the Macedonians, when we had been brought back to Italy and discharged, immediately I set out for Spain as a volunteer soldier with Marcus Porcius the consul.[4] No one, of all the generals now living, was a keener observer and judge of bravery, as those know who have had experience of him and other leaders, too, through long service. This general judged me worthy to be assigned as centurion of the forward first century of the advance formation. For the third time I enlisted, again voluntarily, in the army which was sent against the Aetolians and King Antiochus.[5] By Manius Acilius I was given the rank of centurion of the forward first century of the main formation. When King Antiochus had been driven out and the Aetolians beaten, we were brought back to Italy; and twice forward centurionship (prior), not the very lowest in the legion, the rear (posterior). For the origin of these subdivisions of the legion, cf. VIII. viii. 5–13; Polybius VI. 21. 6–23.

[4] 195 B.C., cf. XXXIII. xlii. 7 and xliii. The consul was the famous Cato the Censor. Ligustinus had returned to Italy before his commander Flamininus, who returned at the same time that Cato came back from Spain.

[5] 191 B.C., cf. XXXVI. i. ff.

A.U.C. 583

annua merebant legiones, stipendia feci. Bis deinde in Hispania militavi, semel Q. Fulvio Flacco, iterum 10 Ti. Sempronio Graccho praetore. A Flacco inter ceteros, quos virtutis causa secum ex provincia ad[1] triumphum deducebat, deductus sum; a Ti. Graccho
11 rogatus in provinciam ii. Quater intra paucos annos primum pilum duxi; quater et tricies virtutis causa donatus ab imperatoribus sum; sex civicas coronas accepi. Viginti duo stipendia annua in exercitu emerita habeo, et maior annis sum quin-
12 quaginta. Quodsi mihi nec stipendia omnia emerita essent necdum aetas vacationem daret, tamen, cum quattuor milites pro me vobis[2] dare, P. Licini,
13 possem, aequum erat me dimitti. Sed haec pro causa mea dicta accipiatis velim; ipse me, quoad quisquam qui exercitus scribit idoneum militem
14 iudicabit, numquam sum excusaturus. Quo ordine[3] me dignum iudicent tribuni militum, ipsorum est potestatis; ne quis me virtute in exercitu praestet, dabo operam; et[4] semper ita fecisse me et[5] imperatores mei et qui una stipendia fecerunt testes sunt.
15 Vos quoque aequum est, commilitones, etsi appellatione vestrum[6] usurpatis ius, cum adulescentes nihil adversus magistratuum senatusque auctoritatem

[1] ad Fr.: ex V.
[2] me vobis Novák: meo uobis V.
[3] quo ordine H. J. Mueller: ordine quo V
[4] et J. F. Gronovius: ut V.
[5] me et Fr.: mut V.
[6] appellatione vostrum Madvig: appellationem uos V.

after that I was in campaigns where the legions served for a year. Then I campaigned twice in Spain, once when Quintus Fulvius Flaccus was praetor,[1] and again when Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus held that office.[2] I was brought home by Flaccus along with the others whom he brought with him from the province for his triumph because of their bravery;[3] I went back to the province because Tiberius Gracchus asked me. Four times within a few years I held the rank of chief centurion; thirty-four times I was rewarded for bravery by my generals; I have received six civic crowns.[4] I have done twenty-two years of service in the army, and I am over fifty years old. But if all my years of service had not been completed and my age did not yet give me exemption, still, since I could give you four soldiers in my place, Publius Licinius, it would be fair to discharge me. But I should like you to accept these things that I have said on my side of the case; for my part, as long as anyone who is enrolling armies considers me fit for service, I will never beg off. Of what rank the military tribunes think me worthy is for them to decide; I shall see to it that no one in the army surpasses me in bravery; and that I have always done so, both my generals and those who have served with me are witnesses. It is fair for you too, fellow-soldiers, even though you are within your rights in this appeal, since, when you were young you never did anything against the authority of the magistrates and the senate, now also

B.C. 171

[1] 181 B.C., cf. XL. i. l, xvi. 7–10, xxx–xxxiii, xxxvi. 10–11 and xxxix–xl.

[2] 180 B.C., cf. XL. xxxv. 2, xl. 14. [3] Cf. XL. xliii. 4–7.

[4] For saving the life of a Roman citizen.

A.U.C. 583

usquam feceritis, nunc quoque in potestate consulum ac senatus[1] esse et omnia honesta loca ducere, quibus rem publicam defensuri sitis."

XXXV. Haec ubi dixit,[2] collaudatum multis verbis P. Licinius[3] consul ex contione in senatum
2 duxit. Ibi quoque ei ex auctoritate senatus gratiae actae, tribunique militares in legione prima primum pilum virtutis causa ei assignarunt. Ceteri centuriones remissa[4] appellatione ad dilectum oboedienter responderunt.
3 Quo maturius in provincias magistratus proficiscerentur, Latinae kalendis Iuniis fuere; eoque sollemni perfecto C. Lucretius praetor omnibus quae ad classem opus erant praemissis Brundisium est pro-
4 fectus. Praeter eos exercitus quos consules comparabant, C. Sulpicio Galbae praetori negotium datum ut quattuor legiones scriberet urbanas,[5] iusto numero peditum equitumque, iisque quattuor tribunos mili-
5 tum ex senatu legeret qui praeessent; sociis Latini nominis imperaret quindecim milia peditum, mille et ducentos equites; is exercitus uti[6] paratus esset
6 quo senatus censuisset. P. Licinio consuli ad exercitum civilem socialemque[7] petenti addita auxilia, Ligurum duo milia, Cretenses sagittarii—incertus numerus, quantum rogati[8] Cretenses misis-
7 sent—Numidae item equites elephantique. In eam

[1] consulum ac senatus H. J. Mueller: ac senatu consultum V.
[2] dixit Fr.: sitis V.
[3] Licinius add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[4] remissa Kreyssig: praemissa V.
[5] scriberet urbanas Fr.: scriberent uruanas V.
[6] uti Fr.: is uti V.
[7] socialemque Fr.: societatemque V.
[8] rogati J. F. Gronovius: rogati auxilia V.

to submit to the consuls and the senate, and to consider every place honourable in which you will be defending the state." B.C. 171

XXXV. When he had said this, Publius Licinius the consul praised him at some length and took him from the assembly to the senate. There also thanks were expressed to him by authorization of the senate, and the military tribunes gave him for his bravery a chief centurionship in the first legion. The other centurions gave up their appeal and obediently responded to the levy.

In order that the magistrates might set out sooner for their provinces, the Latin Festival was held on the first of June;[1] and after this ceremony had been completed the praetor Gaius Lucretius, having sent ahead everything needed for the fleet, set out for Brundisium. Besides those armies which the consuls were raising, the task was given the praetor Gaius Sulpicius Galba of enrolling four city legions of the regular number of infantry and cavalry, and of choosing for them from the senate four military tribunes as commanders; he was to order from the allies of the Latin Name fifteen thousand infantry and twelve hundred cavalry, this force to assemble at a place which the senate should determine. At the request of the consul Publius Licinius, to his army of citizens and allies there were added auxiliary troops, two thousand Ligurians, archers from Crete—the number which the Cretans sent on request is not certain—and also Numidian cavalry and elephants.

[1] But according to the Julian calendar, this would have been some date in April; the calendar divergence at this period can be checked by eclipses of the moon in 190 B.C. (XXXVII. iv. 4) and in 168 (XLIV. xxxvii. 8).

A.U.C. 583

rem legati ad Masinissam Carthaginiensesque missi L. Postumius Albinus, Q. Terentius Culleo, C. Aburius. In Cretam item legatos tres [1] ire placuit, A. Postumium Albinum, C. Decimium,[2] A. Licinium Nervam.

XXXVI. Per idem tempus legati ab rege Perseo venerunt. Eos in oppidum intromitti non placuit, cum iam bellum regi eorum et Macedonibus et 2 senatus decresset et populus iussisset. In aedem Bellonae in senatum introducti ita verba fecerunt: mirari Persea regem quid in Macedoniam exercitus 3 transportati essent; si impetrari a senatu posset,[3] ut ii revocentur, regem de iniuriis, si quas sociis factas quererentur, arbitratu senatus satisfacturum 4 esse. Sp. Carvilius, ad eam ipsam rem ex Graecia remissus ab Cn. Sicinio, in senatu erat.[4] Is Perrhaebiam expugnatam armis, Thessaliae aliquot urbes captas, cetera quae aut ageret aut pararet rex, cum 5 argueret, respondere ad ea legati iussi. Postquam haesitabant, negantes sibi ultra quidquam mandatum esse, iussi renuntiare regi, consulem P. Licinium 6 brevi cum exercitu futurum in Macedonia esse: ad eum, si satisfacere in animo esset, mitteret legatos.

[1] i.C.i.l.t. Fr.: in creta mitterent legatos res V.
[2] Decimium Sigonius: decium V.
[3] posset Fr.: esset V.
[4] erat Fr.: eratuerat V.

---

[1] But below, ch. liii. 8, Perseus takes Perrhaebia all over again. Livy's account here of the king's actions shows that the tale of Perseus' belligerence, as previously told, is a Roman invention to justify the forcing of the "irrepressible conflict" by Rome.

For this purpose there were sent as envoys to Masinissa and the Carthaginians Lucius Postumius Albinus, Quintus Terentius Culleo and Gaius Aburius. It was also decided that three envoys should go to Crete, Aulus Postumius Albinus, Gaius Decimius and Aulus Licinius Nerva. B.C. 171

XXXVI. During the same time envoys from King Perseus arrived. It was decided not to admit them to the city, since the senate had decreed and the people had ordered war with their king and the Macedonians. On being presented before the senate in the temple of Bellona they spoke as follows: King Perseus wondered why armies had been carried across to Macedonia; if he might persuade the senate to recall them, the king would make amends at the discretion of the senate for any wrongs done to their allies, of which they might complain. Spurius Carvilius, who had been sent back from Greece by Gnaeus Sicinius for this very purpose, was in the senate. When he had complained of Perrhaebia's having been stormed by force of arms,[1] of the capture of several Thessalian cities,[2] and of other things which the king was either doing or about to do, the envoys were ordered to make a reply thereto. After they hesitated, saying that they had no further instructions, they were ordered to report to the king that the consul Publius Licinius would shortly be in Macedonia with an army; let the king, if giving satisfaction was his purpose, send envoys to him.

[2] In XLI. xxii. 6 and xxiii. 14 only a peaceful tour of Thessaly is mentioned; by comparing below, ch. xlii. 1 and lxvii. 9–11, we may gather that at least three Thessalian cities struck up an alliance with Perseus as the result of this visitation; but "capture" is a Roman exaggeration.

A.U.C. 583 Romam quod praeterea mitteret non esse; nemini
7 enim eorum[1] per Italiam ire liciturum. Ita dimissis
P. Licinio consuli mandatum intra undecimum[2] diem iuberet eos Italia excedere, et Sp. Carvilium mitteret
8 qui donec navem conscendissent custodiret. Haec
Romae acta, nondum profectis in provinciam consuli-
A.U.C. 582 bus. Iam Cn. Sicinius qui, priusquam magistratu abiret, Brundisium ad classem et ad exercitum prae-missus erat, traiectis in Epirum quinque milibus peditum, trecentis equitibus, ad Nymphaeum in agro 9 Apolloniati castra habebat. Inde tribunos cum duobus milibus[3] militum ad occupanda Dassaretiorum et Illyriorum castella, ipsis accersentibus praesidia, ut tutiores a finitimorum impetu Macedonum essent, misit.

XXXVII. Paucis post diebus Q. Marcius et[4] A. Atilius et P. et Ser. Cornelii Lentuli et L. Decimius, legati in Graeciam missi, Corcyram peditum mille secum advexerunt; ibi inter se et regiones quas obirent

[1] nemini enim eorum Duker: neminemeorum V.
[2] intra undecimum Fr.: ettraxi V.
[3] milibus Fr.: milia V.
[4] et add. Wesenberg: om. V.

---

[1] Livy repeats this account below ch. xlviii. 3, there following Polybius. It should be noted that the events next related actually precede those which Livy has been describing. Appian IX. xi. 5–9 mentions two embassies, the second of which is, as here, sent out of Italy. Both Appian and Polybius (XXVII. 6) say that all Macedonians were ordered to leave Italy, but on thirty days' notice, which was also given the ambassadors (cf. Livy, below).

[2] The number is smaller than that given above in xxvii. 3, and perhaps derives from Polybius.

[3] Strabo VII. v. 8, describes this as "a rock that gives forth fire, and beneath it flow springs of warm water and asphalt—

There was no further reason, the senate declared, B.C. 171 for his sending envoys to Rome; for none of them would be permitted to pass through Italy. After they were thus dismissed, instructions were given to Publius Licinius the consul to order them to depart from Italy within eleven days, and that he should send Spurius Carvilius to guard them until they boarded ship.[1] These things took place at Rome before the consuls took the field. By this time B.C. 172
Gnaeus Sicinius, who before giving up his office had been sent ahead to Brundisium to the fleet and army, had transported to Epirus five thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry[2] and had encamped near the Place of the Nymphs[3] in the territory of Apollonia. Thence he sent tribunes with two thousand soldiers to hold forts of the Dassareti and of the Illyrians, since these peoples themselves requested garrisons, in order that they might be better protected against attack by their neighbours the Macedonians.

XXXVII. A few days later, Quintus Marcius, Aulus Atilius, Publius and Servius Cornelius Lentulus and Lucius Decimius, who had been sent as envoys to Greece, brought a thousand infantry with them to Corcyra; there they divided among themselves both the districts they were to approach, probably because the clods of asphalt in the earth are burned by the fire. And nearby, on a hill, is a mine of asphalt; and the part that is trenched is filled up again in the course of time, since, as Poseidonius says, the earth that is poured into the trenches changes to asphalt." (tr. H. L. Jones, L.C.L.) Nymphs dancing about the fire appeared on coins of Apollonia. A convent preserved the religious association in recent times. The asphalt deposits are still worked, and leakage of gas sometimes supplies the fire.

A.U.C. 582

2 et milites diviserunt. L. Decimius missus est ad Gentium regem Illyriorum, quem si aliquem respectum amicitiae cum populo Romano [1] habere cerneret, temptare ut etiam ad belli societatem perliceret [2] 3 iussus. Lentuli in Cephallaniam missi, ut in Peloponnesum traicerent oramque maris in occidentem 4 versi ante hiemem circumirent. Marcio et Atilio Epirus, Aetolia,[3] Thessalia circumeundae assignantur; inde Boeotiam atque Euboeam adspicere iussi, tum in Peloponnesum traicere; ibi congressuros se cum 5 Lentulis constituunt. Priusquam digrederentur a Corcyra, litterae a [4] Perseo adlatae sunt, quibus quaerebat quae causa Romanis aut in Graeciam 6 traiciendi copias aut urbes occupandi esset. Cui rescribi non placuit, nuntio ipsius qui litteras attulerat dici, praesidii causa ipsarum urbium Romanos facere. 7 Lentuli circumeuntes Peloponnesi oppida, cum sine discrimine omnes civitates adhortarentur ut, quo animo qua fide adiuvissent [5] Romanos Philippi primum, deinde Antiochi bello, eodem adversus Persea iuvarent, fremitum in contionibus movebant,[6] 8 Achaeis indignantibus eodem se loco esse, qui omnia a principiis Macedonici belli praestitissent Romanis, quo Messenii atque Elii, qui et Macedonis

[1] populo Romano add. Weissenborn : om. V.
[2] temptare . . . perliceret Hartel : temptaret . . . perligeret V.
[3] Aetolia Madvig : aetoliet V.
[4] a add. Fr. : om. V.
[5] adiuvissent ed. Lugdunensis 1553 : adiuuassent V.
[6] movebant Fuegner : fremebant V.

---

[1] On Gentius' state of mind, cf. above ch. xxix. 11, contradicting ch. xxvi. 2.

and the soldiers. Lucius Decimius was sent to B.C. 172
Gentius, king of the Illyrians; if he saw that the king had any regard for friendship with the Roman people, he was ordered to try also to induce him to become an ally in the war.[1] The Lentuli were sent to Cephallania, so that they might cross to the Peloponnese and before winter make the circuit of the coast of the westward sea. To Marcius and Atilius, the task of making the circuit of Epirus, Aetolia and Thessaly was assigned; after that, they were ordered to investigate Boeotia and Euboea, and then to cross to the Peloponnese; there they agreed to meet the Lentuli. Before they left Corcyra, a letter from Perseus was brought them, in which he asked what reason the Romans had for either sending troops over to Greece or garrisoning cities. It was decided not to answer him in writing, but to say to the king's messenger, who had brought the letter, that the Romans were acting for the protection of the cities themselves. As the Lentuli went about the towns of the Peloponnese, exhorting all cities indiscriminately to aid the Romans against Perseus with the same good will and loyalty with which they had assisted them first in the war against Philip, then in that against Antiochus, they aroused an unfriendly murmur in the assemblies, because the Achaeans were angered that they, who had offered every assistance to the Romans from the first beginnings of war against Macedonia,[2] should be placed on a level with the peoples of Messene and Elis, who in [2] Not quite true; in the First Macedonian War, the Achaeans opposed the Romans, cf. XXVII. xxxii, XXIX. xii. 14; they joined the Romans early in the Second Macedonian War, XXXII. xxiii. 1–3. On the Eleans, cf. XXXVI. xxxv. 7.

A.U.C. 582

Philippi bello hostes fuissent Romanis et pro Antiocho[1] postea arma[2] adversus populum Ro-9 manum tulissent ac, nuper in Achaicum contributi concilium, velut praemium belli se victoribus Achaeis tradi quererentur.

XXXVIII. Marcius et Atilius ad Gitana, Epiri[3] oppidum, decem milia a[4] mari cum escenderent, concilio Epirotarum habito cum magno omnium assensu auditi sunt; et quadringentos iuventutis eorum in Orestas, ut praesidio essent liberatis ab[5]
2 Macedonibus, miserunt. Inde in Aetoliam progressi ac paucos ibi morati dies, dum in praetoris mortui locum alius sufficeretur, Lycisco[6] praetore facto quem Romanorum favere rebus satis compertum
3 erat, transierunt in Thessaliam. Eo legati Acarnanes et Boetorum exules venerunt. Acarnanes nuntiare iussi quae Philippi primum, Antiochi deinde bello, decepti pollicitationibus regiis, adversus populum Romanum commisissent, ea corri-
4 gendi occasionem illis oblatam. Si male meriti clementiam populi Romani experti essent, bene
5 merendo liberalitatem experirentur. Boeotis expro-

[1] Romanis quo Messenii . . . Antiocho Vahlen Macedonis secludens: romanis et macedonis philippo bellohostes—fuissent messeni adqueaeli pro anthioco V.
[2] arma Madvig: roma V.
[3] Gitana . . . Epiri Kraschenninnikov: gitana eripi V.
[4] a add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[5] ab Drakenborch: ab se V.
[6] Lycisco Madvig: et lycisco V.

[1] The leaders of Epirus belonged to the "wisest" class who favoured a balance of power, and neutrality, as nearly as might be inoffensive to Rome, in the war. The story of how this policy was disturbed by intrigues of Charops, a young man on the make, is told by Polybius (XXVII. 15) but not by Livy.

the war with Philip the Macedonian had been enemies of the Romans and later had borne arms for Antiochus against the Roman people, and, having been recently assigned to the Achaean League, were complaining that they were being handed over as spoils of war to the victorious Achaeans. B.C. 172

XXXVIII. Marcius and Atilius went up to Gitana, a town of Epirus, ten miles from the sea, called a conference of Epirotes, and were heard with great and universal approval;[1] and they sent four hundred native young men to the Orestans[2] to be a guard for those who had been freed from the Macedonians. Thence the Romans proceeded to Aetolia, and, after a stay of a few days there, while a general was being elected in place of the one who had died, upon the election of Lyciscus,[3] who, it was quite certain, favoured the Roman side, the envoys crossed to Thessaly. There Acarnanian envoys and Boeotian exiles came to them. The Acarnanians were ordered to report that an opportunity had presented itself to them of making amends for the acts of hostility done by them against the Roman people because they had been deceived by the kings' promises, first in the war with Philip, then in that with Antiochus.[4] If, when they had ill deserved it, they had experienced the mercy of the Roman people, let them by deserving well experience the Romans' generosity. The Boeotians were reproached

[1] A tribe on the border of Macedonia and Epirus; they were made independent of Macedonia in 196 B.C., cf. XXXIII. xxxiv. 6.

[2] Polybius XXXII. 4, does not give this leader a good character; cf. Livy XLV. xxviii. 7.

[4] Cf. XXXI. xiv. 9, XXXIII. xvi. 3–4, XXXVI. xi. 8 ff.

A.U.C. 582

bratum societatem eos cum Perseo iunxisse. Cum[1] culpam in Ismeniam, principem alterius partis, conferrent et quasdam civitates dissentientes in causam deductas, appariturum id esse Marcius respondit; singulis enim civitatibus de se ipsis 6 consulendi potestatem facturos. Thessalorum Larisae fuit concilium. Ibi et[2] Thessalis benigna materia gratias agendi Romanis pro libertatis munere fuit, et legatis, quod et Philippi prius et post Antiochi bello enixe adiuti a gente Thessalorum essent. Hac[3] mutua commemoratione meritorum accensi animi 7 multitudinis ad omnia decernenda quae Romani vellent.

8 Secundum hoc concilium legati a Perseo rege venerunt privati maxime hospitii fiducia, quod ei paternum cum Marcio erat. Ab huius necessitudinis commemoratione orsi petierunt legati in colloquium 9 veniendi regi potestatem faceret. Marcius et se ita a patre suo accepisse dixit, amicitiam hospitiumque cum Philippo fuisse, et[4] minime immemorem[5] necessitudinis eius legationem eam suscepisse. 10 Colloquium, si satis commode valeret, non fuisse se dilaturum; nunc, ubi primum posset, ad Peneum flumen, qua transitus ab Homolio Dium[6] esset, praemissis qui nuntiarent regi venturos.

[1] cum Kreyssig: eoscum V.
[2] et add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] hac Weissenborn: aut V.
[4] et add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[5] minime immemorem Fr.: minimum memorem V.
[6] ab Homolio Dium Drakenborch: abomonodium V.

---

[1] Cf. below ch. xliii. 7 ff.

[2] This Thessalian League had been set up under Roman auspices, cf. XXXIII. xxxiv. 7 and XXXIV. li. 6.

for having entered into an alliance with Perseus. B.C. 172
When they placed the blame on Ismenias, the leader of the opposite faction, and said that certain cities had been drawn into the affair against their will, Marcius replied that this was about to be made clear; for they were about to give the individual cities an opportunity of providing for their own welfare.[1] A council of the Thessalians was held at Larisa.[2] Both parties found there a pleasant opportunity to express their thanks, the Thessalians for the Romans' gift to them of freedom, and the Roman envoys for the vigorous help from the Thessalian confederacy, first in the war with Philip and again later in that with Antiochus. By this mutual recital of benefits the minds of the gathering were fired to vote everything which the Romans wished.

Following this council, envoys came from King Perseus, relying especially on the personal guest-friendship which existed between his father and the father of Marcius. Beginning with a mention of this relationship, the envoys asked that he give the king the opportunity of coming to confer with him. Marcius said both that he had been told by his father that a relationship of amity and hospitality had existed with Philip, and also that he had been by no means forgetful of this relationship when he undertook this embassy. As for a conference, if he were in sufficiently good health he would not think of deferring it; as it was, they would come, as soon as he was able, to the Peneus river, at the crossing between Homolium and Dium,[3] after sending ahead messengers to inform the king.

[3] That is, at the northern end of the Vale of Tempe.

A.U.C. 582

XXXIX. Et tum quidem ab Dio Perseus in interiora regni recepit[1] se, levi aura spei obiecta quod Marcius ipsius causa suscepisse se legationem dixisset; post dies paucos ad constitutum locum 2 venerunt. Magnus comitatus fuit regius cum amicorum tum satellitum turba stipante. Non minore agmine legati venerunt et ab Larisa multis prosequentibus et legationibus civitatium, quae convenerant Larisam et renuntiare domum certa quae audis- 3 sent volebant. Inerat cura insita mortalibus videndi congredientes[2] nobilem regem et populi principis 4 terrarum omnium legatos. Ut[3] in conspectu steterunt, dirimente amni, paulisper internuntiando cunctatio fuit utri transgrederentur. Aliquid illi regiae maiestati, aliquid hi[4] populi Romani nomini, cum praesertim Perseus petisset colloquium, existi- 5 mabant deberi. Ioco etiam Marcius cunctantes[5] movit: "Minor," inquit, "ad maiores et"—quod Philippo ipsi cognomen erat—"filius ad patrem trans- 6 eat." Facile persuasum id regi est. Aliud deinde ambigebatur, cum quam multis transiret. Rex cum omni comitatu transire aequum censebat; legati vel cum tribus venire iubebant vel, si tantum agmen traduceret, obsides dare nihil fraudis fore in colloquio.

[1] recepit ed. Parisina 1573: recipit V.
[2] videndi congredientes Fr.: uiuendi congredientibus V.
[3] ut add. Madvig: om. V.
[4] hi add. Fr.
[5] cunctantes Fr.: cunctantibus V.

[1] The cognomen was sometimes a personal name, or accepted nickname, sometimes an inherited name indicating a branch

XXXIX. And for the time being Perseus retired B.C. 172 from Dium to the interior of his kingdom, a faint breath of hope presenting itself, because Marcius had said he had undertaken the embassy on Perseus' account; a few days later they met at the spot agreed upon. The royal retinue was large, a crowd, both of friends and attendants, thronging about him. With no less a train came the envoys, for many escorted them from Larisa, besides the embassies of certain cities which had assembled at Larisa and wanted to report home facts which they had heard. There was a desire, natural to mankind, to see the meeting of a famous king and the envoys of the people foremost in the whole world. When they stood in sight of each other, with the river between, there was a brief delay for exchange of messages, as to which party should cross over. The one group felt that some consideration was due to the dignity of the king, the other group, to the reputation of the Roman people, especially since Perseus had sought the conference. A jest from Marcius also influenced the undecided: "Let the younger," said he, "cross over to his elders, and"—for his own personal[1] name was Philip—"the son to his father." This solution easily recommended itself to the king. Then another problem arose, as to how large an escort should cross with him. The king thought it proper to cross with his entire suite; the envoys bade him either to come with three attendants, or, if he should bring over so large a train, to give hostages that there would be no treachery during [1] of the clan or gens; in this case, the name dated back at least to Marcius' grandfather, who triumphed in 281 B.C. Most Marcii had Rex as surname.

A.U.C. 582

7 Hippian et Pantauchum,[1] quos et legatos miserat, principes amicorum, obsides dedit. Nec tam in pignus fidei obsides desiderati erant quam ut appareret sociis nequaquam ex dignitate pari congredi
8 regem cum legatis. Salutatio[2] non tamquam hostium, sed hospitalis ac benigna fuit, positisque sedibus consederunt.

XL. Cum paulisper silentium fuisset, "Expectari nos" inquit Marcius "arbitror, ut respondeamus litteris tuis quas Corcyram misisti, in quibus quaeris quid ita legati[3] cum militibus venerimus et praesidia
2 in singulas urbes dimittamus. Ad hanc interrogationem tuam et non respondere vereor, ne superbum sit, et vera respondere ne nimis acerbum audienti
3 tibi videatur. Sed cum aut verbis castigandus aut armis sit qui foedus rumpit, sicut bellum adversus te alii quam mihi mandatum malim, ita orationis acerbitatem adversus hospitem, utcumque est, subibo, sicut medici cum salutis causa tristiora
4 remedia adhibent.[4] Ex quo regnum adeptus es, unam rem te quae facienda fuerit senatus fecisse censet,[5] quod legatos Romam ad renovandum foedus miseris, quod ipsum tamen tibi non fuisse renovandum[6] iudicat potius quam cum renovatum esset violandum.
5 Abrupolim, socium atque amicum populi Romani, regno expulisti; Arthetauri interfectores, ut caede,

[1] Hippian et Pantaucum Fr. (-chum Crévier): hippian et pantacum V.
[2] salutatio Fr.: salutatis V.
[3] ita legati Fr.: sitallegatis V.
[4] adhibent Fr.: adhibens V.
[5] censet Fr.: genset V.
[6] foedus . . . renovandum add. Sigonius: om. V.

[1] But later he did command the army, XLIII. xv. 3.

the conference. He gave as hostages Hippias and Pantauchus, his leading friends, whom he had also sent as envoys. However, hostages were not desired so much as a pledge of good faith, as to show the allies that the king was meeting with the envoys on no terms of equality. The greetings were not like those of enemies, but welcoming and kindly, and when seats had been placed, they sat down. B.C. 172

XL. After there had been a silence for a moment, "What is awaited, I suppose," said Marcius, "is a reply from us to your letter which you sent to Corcyra, in which you ask why we have come in this fashion as envoys with soldiers and are sending garrisons to the several cities. I hesitate to make no reply to this inquiry of yours, for fear of acting arrogantly, and also to reply truly, lest the reply seem to you, as you hear it, too harsh. But since one who breaks a treaty must be rebuked either with words or with arms, as on the one hand I should prefer war against you to be entrusted to some other rather than to me,[1] so on the other hand I shall take upon myself the harshness of this speech to a guest-friend, however it may be, as physicians do in applying somewhat painful remedies for the sake of a cure. From the time when you attained the throne the senate believes you have done one thing which you should have done, in that you sent envoys to Rome to renew the treaty; yet even this, the senate considers, you should have failed to renew instead of breaking it after it had been renewed. Abrupolis, the ally and friend of the Roman people, you drove from his kingdom;[2] the assassins of Arthetaurus you

[1] For this and the following accusations, cf. above xiii. 6–8 (speech of Eumenes).

A.U.C. 582

ne quid ultra dicam, te[1] laetatum appareret, recepisti, qui[2] omnium Illyriorum fidissimum Romanis[3] regu-
6 lum occiderant; per Thessaliam et Maliensem agrum cum exercitu contra foedus Delphos isti; Byzantiis item contra foedus[4] misisti auxilia; cum Boeotis sociis[5] nostris, secretam tibi ipsi societatem quam
7 non licebat iureiurando pepigisti; Thebanos legatos, Euersam et Callicritum, venientes ad[6] nos, quaerere malo quis interfecerit quam arguere. In Aetolia[7] bellum intestinum et caedes principum per quos,
8 nisi per tuos, factae videri possunt? Dolopes a te ipso evastati sunt. Eumenes rex, ab Roma cum in regnum rediret, prope ut victima Delphis in sacrato loco ante aras mactatus, quem insimulet piget
9 referre; quae hospes Brundisinus occulta facinora indicet, certum habeo et scripta tibi omnia ab Roma
10 esse et legatos renuntiasse tuos.[8] Haec ne dicerentur a me, uno modo vitare[9] potuisti, non quaerendo quam ob causam exercitus in Macedoniam traicerentur, aut praesidia in sociorum urbes

[1] te add. H. J. Mueller : om. V.
[2] qui Fr. : quiut V.
[3] Romanis Novák : romanumii V.
[4] foedus Fr. : foedus delphos V.
[5] sociis Fr. : sociisoci V.
[6] ad Madvig : a V.
[7] Aetolia Fr. : aeto V.
[8] tuos Vahlen : et legatos tuos V.
[9] vitare Fr. : uidere V.

---

[1] Cf. note 2, p. 397; Marcius has Perseus going in the reverse direction, cf. below ch. xlii. 1 and note 2.

[2] A straining of the provision against waging war, XXXIII. xxx. 6.

sheltered, so that it was obvious that you rejoiced, B.C. 173 to say nothing more, in the crime of those who had killed the prince most faithful of all the Illyrians to Rome; you went to Delphi with an army through Thessalian and Malian territory, contrary to the treaty;[1] again, you sent help to the Byzantines, contrary to the treaty;[2] you pledged by oath a secret alliance between yourself and the Boeotians, our allies, which was not permitted;[3] as for the Theban envoys, Eversa and Callicritus, who were on their way to us, I prefer to ask who killed them than to make an accusation. In Aetolia, who, if not your men, can seem to have brought about the civil war and slaughter of leading men?[4] The Dolopians were utterly ravaged by you yourself.[5] King Eumenes, on his return from Rome to his kingdom, was almost slaughtered like a beast for sacrifice on consecrated ground before the altars of Delphi—and I am reluctant to mention whom he accuses[6]; about the secret crimes of which your guest-friend at Brundisium informs us,[7] I am sure that everything has been written you from Rome and also that your own envoys have reported. You could have avoided my saying these things in one way, and that was by not asking for what reason armies were being brought across to Macedonia or why we were sending garri-

[2] No statement of this prohibition appears in either Livy's account of the treaty (XXXIII. xxx) or Polybius' (XVIII. 44), but it was standard Roman practice in the case of dependent cities to forbid them to make treaties with each other. Cf. VIII. xiv. 10.

[4] Cf. XLI. xxv. 1–6, XLII. v. 7.

[5] Cf. XLI. xxii. 4.

[6] Cf. above ch. xv. 3 ff.

[7] Cf. above ch. xvii. 2 ff.

A.U.C. 582

mitteremus. Quaerenti tibi superbius tacuissemus
11 quam vera respondimus. Equidem pro paterno nostro hospitio faveo orationi tuae et opto ut aliquid mihi materiae[1] praebeas agendae tuae apud senatum causae."

XLI. Ad ea rex: "Bonam causam, si apud iudices aequos ageretur, apud eosdem et accusatores et
2 iudices agam.[2] Eorum autem quae obiecta sunt mihi, partim ea sunt, quibus nescio an gloriari debeam, neque[3] quae fateri erubescam, partim quae
3 verbo obiecta verbo negare satis[4] sit. Quid enim, si legibus vestris hodie reus sim, aut index Brundisinus aut Eumenes mihi obiciat, ut accusare potius
4 vere quam conviciari videantur? Scilicet nec Eumenes, cum tam multis gravis[5] publice ac privatim sit, alium quam me inimicum habuit; neque ego potiorem quemquam ad ministeria facinorum quam Rammium, quem neque umquam ante videram
5 nec eram postea visurus, invenire potui. Et Thebanorum, quos naufragio perisse constat, et Arthetauri caedis mihi reddenda ratio est; in qua tamen nihil ultra obicitur, quam interfectores eius in regno
6 exulasse[6] meo. Cuius condicionis iniquitatem ita non sum recusaturus,[7] si vos quoque accipitis ut, quicumque exules in Italiam aut Romam se contule-

[1] materiae Hertz: materiem V.
[2] agam Fr.: agant V.
[3] neque Vahlen: ea (sic) V.
[4] satis add. Hearne: om. V.
[5] gravis Fr.: grauidae V.
[6] exulasse Fr.: exsolasse V.
[7] sum recusaturus Fr.: sumere accusaturus V.

[1] Appian IX. xi. 5–8, puts a speech to the same effect in the mouths of Perseus' envoys (cf. below ch. xlviii. 1–2), including a detailed refutation of Rammius' charge.

sons to the cities of our allies. Since you did inquire, B.C. 172
we should have been more arrogant in keeping silence than we are in replying truthfully. Indeed, on account of our inherited guest-friendship, I am eager to hear what you have to say and hope that you will give me some foundation for pleading your cause before the senate."

XLI. To this the king replied: "A cause, which would be good if it were pled before impartial judges, I shall plead before men who are at once accusers and judges. However, of the charges made against me, some are such that I should perhaps boast of them, not such that I should blush to confess them, others are such that, since they are made in a word, it is enough to deny them in a word.[1] For with what, if I should be a defendant to-day under your laws, could either the informer at Brundisium or Eumenes charge me, so that they might seem truly to accuse me rather than to revile me? Doubtless Eumenes, although he is offensive to so many people because of personal reasons or those of state,[2] had no other enemy than me! Nor could I find anyone superior as a tool in crime to Rammius, whom I had never seen previously nor was to see afterwards! Even for the Thebans, who, it is known, perished by shipwreck, and for the murder of Arthetaurus I must give an accounting! In this latter case, however, no charge is brought against me except that his assassins went into exile in my kingdom. The unfairness of this situation I shall not protest, on condition that you too agree that whenever exiles betake themselves to Italy or Rome you will confess

[1] A similar charge in ch. xiv. 8 above; ch. v. 5, gives the Roman view.

A.U.C. 582

runt, his facinorum, propter quae damnati sunt,
7 auctores vos fuisse fateamini. Si hoc et vos recusabitis et omnes aliae gentes, ego quoque inter ceteros ero. Et hercule, quid attinet cuiquam exilium patere,
8 si nusquam exuli futurus locus est? Ego tamen istos, ut primum in Macedonia esse admonitus a vobis comperi, requisitos abire ex regno iussi et in per-
9 petuum interdixi finibus meis. Et haec quidem mihi tamquam causam dicenti reo obiecta sunt; illa tamquam regi et quae de foedere quod mihi est vobis-
10 cum disceptationem habeant. Nam si est in foedere ita scriptum ut ne si bellum quidem quis inferat, tueri me regnumque meum liceat, mihi fatendum est quod me armis adversus Abrupolim, socium populi Romani, defenderim, foedus violatum esse.
11 Sin autem hoc et [1] ex foedere licuit et iure gentium ita comparatum est ut arma armis propulsentur, quid tandem me facere decuit, cum Abrupolis fines mei regni usque ad Amphipolim pervastasset, multa libera capita, magnam vim mancipiorum, multa
12 milia pecorum abegisset? Quiescerem et paterer, donec Pellam et in regiam meam armatus pervenisset? At enim bello quidem iusto sum persecutus,[2] sed vinci non oportuit eum neque alia quae [3] victis accidunt pati; quorum casum cum ego subierim, qui sum [4] armis lacessitus, quid potest queri sibi

[1] et Fr.: est V.
[2] sum persecutus Fr.: sumpserecuius V.
[3] alia quae Kreyssig: aliquae V.
[4] sum Fr.: sub V.

that you were sponsors of the crimes for which they B.C. 172 have been condemned. If both you and all other peoples will protest against this, I too shall be among the others. And, heavens, what use is there for exile to be allowed to anyone, if there is to be nowhere room for the fugitive? However, as soon as I had learned, on advices from you, that these men were in Macedonia, I had them searched out, ordered them to depart from my kingdom, and banished them forever from my territory. And these charges have been made against me as if I were a prisoner at the bar; the other charges are made as against a king, and are such as to involve interpretation of the treaty between you and me. For if it is written in the treaty that I may not be permitted to protect myself and my kingdom, even if someone attacks me, then I must confess that, inasmuch as I have defended myself with arms against Abrupolis, an ally of the Roman people, the treaty has been broken. But if, on the other hand, it is both permitted by the treaty and is arranged by the law of nations that arms may be beaten back by arms, what, pray, was it proper for me to do when Abrupolis devastated the confines of my kingdom even to Amphipolis, and carried off many free persons, a great abundance of slaves, and many thousand cattle? Should I have kept quiet and suffered, until he came armed to Pella and into my palace? But, you say, I proceeded against him in a just war indeed, but he should not have been conquered, nor have suffered the further consequences which befall the conquered; since I, who was assailed with arms, suffered the misfortune of like disasters, how can he who was the cause of the war complain that they

A.U.C. 582

13 accidisse, qui causa belli fuit? Non sum eodem modo defensurus, Romani, quod Dolopas armis coercuerim; quia, etsi non merito eorum, iure feci meo, cum mei regni, meae dicionis essent, vestro decreto 14 patri attributi meo. Nec, si causa reddenda sit, non vobis nec foederatis,[1] sed iis qui ne[2] in servos quidem saeva atque iniusta imperia probant, plus aequo et bono saevisse in eos videri possum; quippe Euphranorem, praefectum a me impositum, ita occiderunt ut mors[3] poenarum eius levissima fuerit.

XLII. At cum processissem inde ad visendas Larisam et Antronas et Pteleon,[4] qua in propinquo Delphi sunt,[5] sacrificandi causa, ut[6] multo ante
2 debita vota persolverem, Delphos escendi. Et his, crimi[illegible]nis augendi causa, cum exercitu me isse[7] adicitur; scilicet ut, quod nunc vos facere queror, urbes occuparem, arcibus imponerem[8] praesidia.
3 Vocate in concilium Graeciae civitates per quas iter feci, queratur unusquilibet militis mei iniuriam; non recusabo quin simulato sacrificio aliud petisse videar.
4 Aetolis et Byzantiis praesidia misimus et cum Boeotis amicitiam fecimus. Haec, qualiacumque sunt, per [1] foederatis Fr.: foederi V.

[2] ne add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] mors Fr.: mores V.
[4] Pteleon Ruperti: pycleon V.
[5] Delphi sunt Vahlen: delphis V.
[6] ut add. Vahlen: om. V.
[7] me isse Kreyssig: messe V.
[8] imponerem Fr.: opponere V.

[1] According to Appian (loc. cit.) the Romans had accepted Perseus' explanation of this incident and renewed the treaty with him after it.

happened to him?[1] I will not use the same defence, B.C. 172
Romans, for having checked the Dolopians with arms; since, even had they not deserved it, I acted within my rights, since they were in my kingdom and under my sway, having been assigned by your decree to my father. Moreover, if it were proper for me to give an accounting, I could not seem, I will not say to you and your allies, but even to those who do not approve harsh and unjust exercise of authority even over slaves, to have exceeded justice and virtue in punishing them; inasmuch as they killed Euphranor, the governor placed over them by me, in such fashion that death would have been the lightest of vengeance for him.

XLII. "But when I proceeded thence to see Larisa and Antronae and Pteleon,[2] by a way near which is Delphi, I went up to Delphi to offer sacrifice in order to pay vows long overdue. And to this charge—that the accusation may be greater—is added the further charge that I went with an army; as if indeed it was in order to seize cities, as I now am complaining of your doing, and to place garrisons in the citadels. Call to conference the cities of Greece through which I made my way, let any single person complain of injury from a soldier of mine; I shall not protest against being thought to have, by a pretence of sacrifice, sought ulterior ends. To the Aetolians and Byzantines we have sent military forces, and with the Boeotians we have made a treaty of friendship. These acts, such as they are, have been legatos meos non solum indicata sed etiam excusata sunt saepe in senatu vestro, ubi aliquos ego disceptatores non tam aequos quam te, Q.[1] Marci, paternum amicum et hospitem, habebam. Sed nondum Romam accusator Eumenes venerat, qui calumniando[2] omnia detorquendoque suspecta et invisa efficeret et persuadere vobis conaretur, non posse Graeciam in libertate esse et vestro munere frui, quoad regnum Macedoniae incolume esset. Circumagetur hic orbis; erit mox, qui arguat nequiquam Antiochum ultra iuga Tauri emotum;[3] graviorem multo Asiae quam[4] Antiochus fuerit, Eumenen esse;[5] conquiescere socios vestros non posse quoad regia Pergami sit; eam arcem supra capita finitimarum civitatium impositam. Ego haec, Q. Marci et A. Atili, quae aut a vobis obiecta aut purgata a me sunt, talia esse scio ut aures, ut animi audientium sint, nec tam referre, quid ego aut qua mente fecerim quam quomodo id vos factum accipiatis. Conscius mihi sum nihil me scientem deliquisse, et, si quid fecerim imprudentia lapsus, corrigi me et emendari castigatione hac posse. Nihil certe insanabile nec quod bello et armis persequendum esse censeatis commisi; aut frustra clementiae gravitatisque vestrae fama volgata per gentes est, si talibus de causis, quae vix querella et expostulatione dignae[6] sunt, arma capitis et regibus sociis bella infertis."

[2] These cities were in south-eastern Thessaly; Perseus took a somewhat indirect route to them, which, however, avoided hostile Thessaly and probably included the friendly cities in Boeotia. Cf. above, n. 2, p. 397.

A.U.C. 582

XLIII. Haec dicenti ei cum assensum esset,[7]

[1] te Q. Fr.: teque V. [2] calumniando Fr.: calumiain V.
[3] iuga Tauri emotum J. F. Gronovius: legatauremotum V.
[4] graviorem . . . quam Fr.: grauiore—quequam V.
[5] Eumenem esse Fr.: Eumene necesse V.
[6] expostulatione dignae Fr.: postulatione digna V.
[7] haec dicenti ei cum adsensum esset Harant: et dicentem et cum adsensum V.

frequently not only announced but even defended B.C. 172 by my envoys in your senate, where I usually found certain critics not as fair-minded as you, Quintus Marcius, a friend and guest by inheritance. But Eumenes had not as yet come to Rome as accuser, in order by slandering and distorting everything to arouse general suspicion and hatred and to try to persuade you that it is impossible for Greece to be free and to enjoy your bounty as long as the kingdom of Macedonia is intact. This argument will be brought around full circle; soon there will be one to charge that Antiochus was to no avail driven beyond the range of Taurus; a far worse tyrant over Asia than Antiochus had been exists in Eumenes; your allies cannot take their ease as long as the palace of Pergamum stands; that looms like a citadel over the heads of neighbouring states. I am aware, Quintus Marcius and Aulus Atilius, that these charges which have either been made by you or answered by me are such as the ears and minds of the hearers are, and that it does not so much matter what I have done or with what intent as how you will receive the action. I am confident that I have done no wrong knowingly and that if I have done anything through an unintentional slip, I can be corrected and bettered by this rebuke. Certainly I have done nothing irreparable, nor such that you should think it must be avenged by war and arms; or else the fame of your mercy and poise has been spread abroad among the nations all in vain, if for such causes, which are hardly worthy of complaint and protest, you rush to arms and declare war on your royal allies."

XLIII. When applause had followed this speech,

A.U.C. 582

Marcius auctor fuit mittendi Romam legatos;[1] cum experienda omnia ad ultimum nec praetermittendam spem ullam censuisset rex,[2] reliqua consultatio erat, quonam modo tutum iter legatis
2 esset. Ad id cum[3] necessaria petitio indutiarum videretur cuperetque Marcius neque aliud colloquio petisset, gravate et in[4] magnam gratiam petentis
3 concessit. Nihil enim satis paratum ad bellum in praesentia habebant Romani, non exercitum, non ducem, cum Perseus, ni spes vana pacis occaecasset consilia, omnia praeparata atque instructa haberet[5] et suo maxime tempore atque alieno hostibus incipere bellum posset.

4 Ab hoc colloquio, fide indutiarum interposita, legati
5 Romani in Boeotiam confestim profecti[6] sunt. Ibi motus coeperat esse discedentibus a societate[7] communis concilii Boeotorum quibusdam populis, ex quo renuntiatum erat respondisse legatos appariturum, quibus populis proprie societatem cum rege iungi
6 displicuisset. Primi a Chaeronia legati deinde a Thebis[8] in ipso itinere occurrerunt, affirmantes non interfuisse se, quo societas ea decreta esset concilio; quos[9] legati, nullo in praesentia responso dato,
7 Chalcidem se sequi iusserunt. Thebis magna contentio orta erat ex alio certamine. Comitiis praetoris et Boeotarcharum[10] victa pars iniuriam persequens

[1] legatos Harant: legati essent V.
[2] rex add. Harant: om. V.
[3] cum add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] et in Fr.: etiam V.
[5] haberet add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] confestim profecti Giarratano: conparati V.
[7] discedentibus a societate Fr.: descendentibus in societatem V.
[8] a Thebis Fr.: athenis V.
[9] quos J. F. Gronovius: hquis (sic) V.
[10] praetoris et Boeotarcharum Niese: praetoris boetarum V.

Marcius proposed his sending envoys to Rome; B.C. 172
since the king believed that every recourse should be tried to the very last and no hope be overlooked, the rest of the conference was on means of safety for the envoys' journey. Although for this a request for a truce was clearly essential and Marcius was eager for it and was seeking for nothing else at the conference, he granted it grudgingly and as a great favour to the petitioner. For the Romans had nothing thoroughly ready for war at this time, neither army nor leader, while Perseus, had not an idle hope of peace blinded his counsels, would have had everything ready and on hand and could have begun the war at a time most favourable to himself and inopportune for the enemy.

From this conference the Roman envoys, relying on the truce as security, at once set out for Boeotia.[1] In that region there already had begun to be disturbance as certain peoples departed from association in the common council of the Boeotians, after the report had come that the envoys had answered that it would become evident which peoples for their own part disliked the forming of an alliance with the king. First envoys from Chaeronia, then from Thebes, met the Romans while still on the way, asserting that they had not been present in the council in which this alliance had been voted; the Roman envoys, giving them no answer for the time being, ordered them to follow them to Chalcis. At Thebes a great dispute arose from a different rivalry. The party beaten in the election for general and the Governors of Boeotia, by way of avenging their coacta multitudine decretum Thebis fecit ne Boeotarchae[1] urbibus reciperentur. Exules Thespias 8 universi concesserunt; inde—recepti enim sine cunctatione erant—Thebas iam mutatis animis revocati decretum faciunt, ut duodecim, qui privati coetum et concilium habuissent, exilio multarentur. 9 Novus deinde praetor—Ismenias is erat, vir nobilis ac potens—capitalis poenae absentes eos decreto damnat. Chalcidem fugerant; inde ad Romanos Larisam profecti causam cum Perseo societatis in Ismeniam contulerant; ex ea[2] contentione ortum 10 certamen. Utriusque tum[3] partis legati ad Romanos venerunt, et exules accusatoresque Ismeniae et Ismenias ipse.

[1] Cf. Polybius XXVII. 1–2.

A.U.C. 582

XLIV. Chalcidem ut ventum est, aliarum civitatium principes, id quod maxime gratum erat Romanis, suo quique[4] proprio decreto regiam[5] societatem aspernati Romanis se adiungebant; Ismenias gentem Boeotorum in fidem Romanorum permitti aequum 2 censebat. Inde certamine orto, nisi in tribunal legatorum perfugisset, haud multum afuit quin ab 3 exulibus fautoribusque eorum interficeretur. Thebae quoque ipsae, quod Boeotiae caput est, in magno motu[6] erant, aliis ad regem trahentibus civitatem, [1] fecit ne Boeotarchae Fr.: sine bello (in ras.) et arce V.

[2] ea add. Madvig: om. V.
[3] tum Wesenberg: tamen V.
[4] quique Fr.: quoque V.
[5] regiam Weissenborn: propriam V.
[6] magno motu Kreyssig: magnotu V.

[1] Cf. above xxxviii. 5.

rebuff, gathered a mob and passed a vote at Thebes B.C. 172 that the Governors be not received in the cities. The exiles all departed to Thespiae; from there—for they had been received without hesitation—they were recalled, by a change of sentiment, to Thebes and passed a decree that twelve men who though private citizens had held an assembly and council should be punished by exile. Next, the new general—he was Ismenias, a man of rank and power—by decree in their absence condemned these men to death. They fled to Chalcis; thence they set out to the Romans at Larisa [1] and brought a charge of alliance with Perseus against Ismenias; from this dispute, they said, the contest had arisen. Envoys of both factions came at that time to the Romans, both the exiles and accusers of Ismenias, and Ismenias himself.

XLIV. When the party arrived at Chalcis, a thing very pleasing to the Romans occurred, for the chief men of the other states each by their own particular decree rejected the alliance with the king and associated themselves with the Romans; Ismenias thought it proper to put the Boeotian League in the care of the Romans.[2] Thereupon a dispute arose, and save that he escaped to the headquarters [3] of the Roman envoys, Ismenias lacked little of meeting his death at the hands of the exiles and their partisans. Thebes itself, the capital of Boeotia, was also in a great uproar, as some urged the city toward the king,

[1] As Polybius XXVII. 1. 2–3 points out, this was unacceptable to the Romans, who wanted to destroy the Boeotian League (cf. 6 below).

[2] The exact meaning of tribunal (usually, an official platform) here is uncertain; Polybius l. 6 speaks of δίθυρα (lit. double doors) translated " porch " by Paton, L.C.L.

A.U.C. 582

4 aliis ad Romanos; et turba Coronaeorum Haliartiorumque convenerat ad defendendum decretum regiae societatis. Sed constantia principum docentium cladibus Philippi Antiochique, quanta esset vis et fortuna imperii Romani, victa tandem [1] multitudo et, ut tolleretur regia societas decrevit, et eos, qui auctores paciscendae amicitiae fuerant, ad satisfaciendum legatis Chalcidem misit fideique legatorum 5 commendari civitatem iussit. Thebanos Marcius et Atilius laeti audierunt auctoresque et his et [2] separatim singulis fuerunt ad renovandam amicit- 6 iam mittendi Romam legatos. Ante omnia exules restitui iusserunt et auctores regiae societatis decreto suo damnarunt. Ita, quod maxime volebant, discusso Boeotico concilio in Peloponnesum [3] pro- 7 ficiscuntur Ser. Cornelio Chalcidem accersito.[4] Argis [5] praebitum est iis concilium; ubi nihil [6] aliud a gente Achaeorum petierunt quam ut mille milites darent. 8 Id praesidium ad Chalcidem tuendam, dum Romanus exercitus in Graeciam traiceretur, missum est. Marcius et Atilius peractis quae agenda in Graecia erant principio hiemis Romam redierunt.

[1] tandem Madvig: eadem V.
[2] et add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[3] in Peloponnesum Madvig: ponnensum V.
[4] accersito Fr.: arcersito V.
[5] Argis Fr.: argi V.
[6] nihil Fr.: res V. post res lacunam susp. viri docti.

---

[1] According to Polybius XXVII l. 9 Olympichus of Coronea swung over to the Roman side, and carried the assembly with him; Livy trusts the upper classes, and suspects the worst of the commons, cf. e.g. above ch. xxx. 1; the attitude is that adopted by the Romans as a principle of provincial management.

others toward the Romans; and a mob from Coronea B.C. 172 and Haliartus had assembled to defend the vote of alliance with the king. But due to the steadfastness of the chief men [1] in demonstrating by the disasters which had befallen Philip and Antiochus how great was the might and good fortune of the Roman State, the commons were at length overcome and voted to cancel the alliance with the king, besides sending to Chalcis those who had been sponsors of sanctioning the friendly relations to make amends to the envoys, and ordering that the city be recommended to the care of the envoys. Marcius and Atilius heard the Thebans with joy and recommended both to these and severally to the various others that they send envoys to Rome to renew friendly relations. First of all they ordered that the exiles be restored, and condemned by their own decree the sponsors of alliance with the king.[2] Thus having obtained their fondest desire, the disruption of the Boeotian League, they set out for the Peloponnese after summoning Servius Cornelius to Chalcis. An assembly was called for them at Argos; [3] there they asked nothing of the Achaean League but the contribution of one thousand soldiers. This garrison was sent to guard Chalcis [4] until the Roman army could be brought over to Greece. Marcius and Atilius, having accomplished their mission in Greece, as winter came on returned to Rome.

[1] According to Polybius XXVII. 2. 8–9, Ismenias and Dicetas were imprisoned and committed suicide; Neon, the third pro-Macedonian leader, escaped to Macedonia.

[2] Cf. Polybius, loc. cit., 11.

[4] Chalcis was one of the three "fetters of Greece," cf. XXXI. xxiii. 11–12, XXXII. xxxvii. 3, XXXIII. xxxi. 4 and 11, XXXV. xxxiv. 4.

A.U.C. 582

XLV. Inde legatio sub idem tempus in Asiam et[1] circum insulas missa. Tres erant legati, Ti. Claudius, Sp. Postumius, M. Iunius. Ii circumeuntes hortabantur socios ad suscipiendum adversus Persea pro[2] Romanis bellum; et, quo quaeque opulentior civitas erat eo accuratius agebant, quia minores secuturae maiorum auctoritatem erant. Rhodii maximi ad omnia momenti habebantur, quia non fovere[3] tantum, sed adiuvare etiam[4] viribus suis bellum poterant, quadraginta navibus auctore Hegesilocho praeparatis; qui cum in summo magistratu esset—prytanin ipsi vocant—multis orationibus pervicerat Rhodios, ut omissa quam saepe vanam[5] experti essent, regum fovendorum spe Romanam societatem, unam tum[6] in terris vel viribus vel fide stabilem, retinerent. Bellum imminere cum[7] Perseo; desideraturos Romanos eundem navalem apparatum quem nuper Antiochi, quem Philippi ante bello vidissent. Trepidaturos tum repente paranda classe cum mittenda esset nisi reficere naves, nisi instruere navalibus sociis coepissent. Id eo magis enixe[8]

[1] et add. Duker : om. V.
[2] pro add. Fr. : om. V.
[3] fovere Kreyssig : fauere V.
[4] adiuvare etiam Fr. : adiuuarent V.
[5] vanam Fr. : una V.
[6] societatem unam tum Fr. : societationem una tum V.
[7] imminere cum Fr. : imminerentum V.
[8] Id eo magis enixe Fr. : eoagirenixae V.

[1] Polybius XXVII. 3. This is perhaps the same embassy mentioned above, ch. xix. 7.

XLV. Thence an embassy had been sent during B.C. 172 this time to Asia and among the islands.[1] There were three envoys, Tiberius Claudius, Spurius Postumius and Marcus Junius. These went about exhorting the allies to undertake war against Perseus on the side of the Romans; and the richer any given city was the more painstakingly they negotiated there, because the lesser cities would follow the leadership of the greater. The Rhodians were considered of the greatest importance in everything, because they could not only embrace the war, but assist in it, too, with their forces, since forty ships had been made ready, on motion of Hegesilochus; this man, who held the chief magistracy—their own title is prytanis[2]—had by numerous speeches won over the Rhodians to give up the hope, which they had repeatedly discovered to be idle, of currying favour with kings, and to keep the alliance with Rome, the only alliance in the world at that time which was secure whether through power or trustworthiness. War with Perseus, said Hegesilochus, was imminent; the Romans would call for the same naval force which they had recently seen in the war with Antiochus, and previously in that with Philip.[3] The Rhodians would be in a panic over the sudden need to prepare a fleet at the time it should be sent, if they did not begin to refit their ships and equip them with sailors. This they must do with the greater vigour in order to [2] This officer seems to have been chief executive for six months, two prytaneis being in office for the year, cf. Polybius XXVII. 7. 2 and XXIX. 10.

[3] Cf. XXXI. xlvii. 3; XXXII. xvi. 6; XXXVI. xlv. 5; XXXVII. ix. 5; xxii. 1–2; xxx for participation by the Rhodians in Roman campaigns.

A.U.C. 582

faciundum esse ut crimina delata ab Eumene fide
7 rerum refellerent. His incitati quadraginta navium classem instructam ornatamque legatis Romanis advenientibus, ut non expectatam adhortationem
8 esse appareret, ostenderunt. Et haec legatio magnum ad conciliandos animos civitatium Asiae momentum fuit. Decimius unus sine ullo effectu, captarum etiam pecuniarum ab regibus Illyriorum suspicione infamis, Romam redit.

XLVI. Perseus, cum ab[1] colloquio Romanorum in Macedoniam recepisset sese, legatos Romam de incohatis[2] cum Marcio condicionibus pacis misit; et Byzantium et Rhodum et . . .[3] legatis
2 ferendas dedit. In litteris eadem sententia ad omnes erat, collocutum se cum Romanorum legatis; quae audisset quaeque dixisset, ita disposita, ut superior
3 fuisse in disceptatione videri posset. Apud Rhodios legati adiecerunt[4] confidere pacem futuram; auctoribus enim Marcio atque Atilio missos Romam legatos.[5] Si pergerent Romani contra foedus movere bellum, tum omni gratia, omni ope[6] nitendum fore Rhodiis
4 ut reconcilient pacem; si nihil deprecando proficiant, id agendum, ne omnium rerum ius ac potestas ad unum populum perveniat. Cum ceterorum id interesse, tum praecipue Rhodiorum, quo[7] plus inter

[1] ab Kreyssig: ad V.
[2] de incohatis Fr.: deincohortis V.
[3] lacunam indicant edd. fere universi.
[4] adiecerunt Novák: assederunt V.
[5] Romam legatos Fr.: romanos V.
[6] ope Fr.: opepe V.
[7] quo Crévier: qui V.

refute by the proof of actions the accusations brought by Eumenes. Aroused by these arguments, they displayed to the Roman envoys on their arrival, so that it might be evident that they had not waited to be urged, a fleet of forty ships prepared and equipped. This embassy, moreover, had great weight in winning the allegiance of the states of Asia. Decimius alone returned to Rome without accomplishing anything, and disgraced by the suspicion of having even solicited bribes from the Illyrian kings. B.C. 172

XLVI. When Perseus had returned to Macedonia from his conference with the Romans, he sent to Rome envoys about the terms of peace outlined with Marcius; also to Byzantium and Rhodes . . . he gave the envoys [letters] to present.[1] In the letters the same sentiments were expressed to all, namely, that he had conferred with envoys from Rome; what he had heard and what he had said had turned out to be such that he might seem to have had the better of the discussion. Before the Rhodians [2] the envoys added that the king was sure there would be peace; for at the suggestion of Marcius and Atilius envoys had been sent to Rome. If the Romans continued to stir up war contrary to the treaty, then the Rhodians must strive with all their resources of friendly influence to bring peace again; if they did not succeed with their entreaties, they must act to prevent authority and power over everything coming into the hands of a single people. This was to the interest both of all states and especially of the Rhodians, in proportion as they were outstanding

[1] Names of other cities may have fallen out; "letters" is an obvious inference from the context.

[2] With this chapter cf. Polybius XXVII. 4.

A.U.C. 582

alias civitates dignitate atque opibus excellant; quae serva atque obnoxia fore, si[1] nullus alio sit quam ad Romanos respectus. Magis et litterae et verba legatorum benigne sunt audita quam momentum ad mutandos animos habuerunt; potentior esse partis melioris auctoritas coeperat. Responsum ex decreto est optare pacem Rhodios; si bellum esset, ne quid ab Rhodiis speraret aut peteret rex, quod veterem amicitiam, multis magnisque meritis pace bellogue partam, diiungeret sibi ac[2] Romanis. Ab Rhodo redeuntes Boeotiae quoque civitates, et Thebas et Coroneam et Haliartum, adierunt, quibus expressum invitis existimabatur ut relicta regia societate Romanis adiungerentur. Thebani nihil moti sunt, quamquam[3] et damnatis principibus et restitutis exulibus suscensebant Romanis. Coronaei et Haliartii, favore quodam insito in reges, legatos in Macedoniam miserunt praesidium petentes, quo se adversus impotentem superbiam Thebanorum tueri possint. Cui legationi responsum ab rege est, praesidium se propter indutias cum Romanis factas mittere non [1] fore si Fr.: fores V.

[2] ac Madvig: ab V.
[3] quamquam Novák: et quamquam nihil V.

[1] Polybius, loc. cit., puts at this point a loftier reason—that the Rhodians especially valued their own independence and the freedom of Greece: ὅσῳ γὰρ πλεῖον ὀρέγονται τῆς ἰσηγορίας καὶ παρρησίας καὶ διατελοῦσι προστατοῦντες . . . τῆς τῶν ἄλλων Ἑλλήνων ἐλευθερίας.

[2] Polybius uses the corresponding adjective τοῦ βελτίονος; such adjectives are likely in Greek and Roman literature to connote the conservative aristocracy, or upper class.

[3] A separate embassy, according to Polybius.

[4] Polybius XXVII. 5 does not mention the Thebans, but speaks of the embassy going to Thisbe, as well as Coronea among other states in position and resources;[1] these blessings would be enslaved and in bondage, if there were no recourse to anyone but the Romans. The friendly hearing given to the letter and the words of the envoys was greater than the weight they had in changing the Rhodians' minds; the influence of the better[2] party began to be the stronger. The reply as voted was that the Rhodians hoped for peace; if there were war, the king must not expect or ask anything of the Rhodians which would destroy between them and the Romans the ancient friendship, cemented by many great services in peace and war. On the way back from Rhodes,[3] the envoys also approached the cities of Boeotia, not only Thebes but also Coronea and Haliartus, for it was believed that their desertion of the alliance with the king and adhesion to the Romans had been forced upon them against their will. The Thebans were not at all moved, although, both for the condemnation of the chief men and the restoration of the exiles, they were angry with the Romans.[4] The peoples of Coronea and Haliartus, through some inborn prejudice in favour of kings, sent envoys to Macedonia asking for a garrison, by which they might protect themselves against the reckless insolence of the Thebans. To this embassy the king's reply was, that because of the truce made with the Romans he could not send them a garrison; however, B.C. 172 and Haliartus. In view of this, and of the apparently unchallenged dominance of the pro-Roman party at Thebes (cf. secs. 9–10 below), it seems certain that Livy, either because of a faulty MS., or because of his own slip, read Θήβας for Θίσβας in Polybius, and should not have brought Thebes in at this point.

A.U.C. 583

posse; tamen ita suadere ab[1] Thebanorum iniuriis qua possent ut se vindicarent, ne Romanis praeberent causam in se saeviendi.

XLVII. Marcius et Atilius Romam cum venissent, legationem in Capitolio ita renuntiarunt ut nulla re magis gloriarentur quam decepto per indutias et
2 spem pacis rege. Adeo enim apparatibus belli fuisse instructum, ipsis nulla parata re, ut omnia opportuna loca praeoccupari ante ab eo potuerint
3 quam exercitus in Graeciam traiceretur. Spatio autem indutiarum sumpto aequum bellum[2] venturum: illum nihilo paratiorem, Romanos omnibus instructiores rebus coepturos bellum. Boeotorum quoque se concilium arte distraxisse[3] ne coniungi
4 amplius ullo consensu Macedonibus possent. Haec ut summa ratione acta magna pars senatus approbabat;[4] veteres et moris antiqui memores negabant se in ea legatione Romanas agnoscere artes.
5 Non per insidias et nocturna proelia, nec simulatam fugam improvisosque ad incautum hostem reditus, nec ut astu magis quam vera virtute gloriarentur, bella[5] maiores gessisse: indicere prius quam gerere solitos bella, denuntiare etiam interdum pugnam et

[1] ab Kreyssig: ad V.
[2] aequum (aecum) bellum Fuegner: haecum V.
[3] distraxisse Fr.: distraxissent V.
[4] approbabat Fr.: adprobat V.
[5] bella Fr.: bella magis quam V.

[1] Livy's central theme is the old Roman character and its decline and fall (Preface, 9); his patriotism does not blind

he advised them to protect themselves as best they might against the injustice of the Thebans in such a way as not to offer the Romans an excuse for harshness against them. B.C. 172

XLVII. When Marcius and Atilius had arrived in Rome, in the Capitol they reported about their embassy, emphasizing nothing as a greater achievement than the deception of the king by the truce and the hope of peace. For he had been, they said, so equipped with apparatus for war, while the Romans had made no preparations, that all the commanding places might have been seized by him before an army could be sent over to Greece. However, with the time consumed by the truce, the war would be waged on even terms; he would be in no way better prepared, and the Romans would start the war better equipped in everything. Also they had subtly disrupted the Boeotian League, they said, so that the Boeotians could no longer be joined by any common action to the Macedonians. These actions a large part of the senate approved as having been done with great wisdom; the older men and those mindful of ancient custom said they did not recognize in this embassy the ways of Rome.[1]

"Not by ambushes and battles by night," they thought, "nor by pretended flight and unexpected return to an enemy off his guard, nor in such a way as to boast of cunning rather than real bravery, did our ancestors wage war; they were accustomed to declare war before they waged it, and even at times to announce a battle and specify the place in which

him to certain lapses from the traditional standard, cf. e.g. IX. xi; cf. also Diodorus XXX. 7.

A.U.C. 582

6 locum[1] finire, in quo dimicaturi essent. Eadem fide indicatum Pyrrho regi medicum vitae eius insidiantem; eadem Faliscis vinctum traditum prodi-
7 torem liberorum; religionis haec Romanae[2] esse, non versutiarum Punicarum neque calliditatis Graecae, apud quos[3] fallere hostem quam vi superare gloriosius
8 fuerit. Interdum in praesens tempus plus profici dolo quam virtute; sed eius demum animum in perpetuum vinci, cui confessio expressa sit se neque

[1] pugnam et locum Kreyssig: om. V. Alii alia: diem et locum Weissenborn fortasse malis.
[2] religionis haec Romanae Vahlen: regis haec romana V.
[3] quos add. Fr.: om. V.

---

[1] Polybius XIII. 3 tells the same story of Roman warfare, citing it as the one remaining example of the practice formerly adhered to by the Greeks. "The ancients, as we know, were far removed from such malpractices (as treacherous dealings). For so far were they from plotting mischief against their friends, with the purpose of aggrandizing their own power, that they would not even consent to get the better of their enemies by fraud, regarding no success as brilliant or secure unless they crushed the spirit of their adversaries in open battle. For this reason they entered into a convention among themselves to use against each other neither secret missiles nor those discharged from a distance, and considered that it was only a hand-to-hand battle at close quarters which was truly decisive. Hence they preceded war by a declaration and when they intended to do battle gave notice of the fact and of the spot to which they would proceed and array their army. But at the present they say it is a sign of poor generalship to do anything openly in war. Some slight traces, however, of the ancient principles of warfare survive among the Romans. For they make declaration of war, they very seldom use ambuscades, and they fight hand-to-hand at close quarters" (tr. Paton, L.C.L.). Tacitus, Germania, 6. 6 notes they were going to fight.[1] With the same straightforwardness the information was given to King Pyrrhus that his physician was plotting against his life; in the same way the betrayer of their children was delivered bound to the Faliscans;[2] these are the acts of Roman scrupulousness, not of Carthaginian artfulness[3] nor of Greek slyness, since among these peoples it has been more praiseworthy to deceive an enemy than to conquer by force. Occasionally a greater advantage is gained for the time being by trickery than by courage, but final and lasting conquest of the spirit overtakes one from whom the admission has been extorted that he has been con- B.C. 172 that the Germans regarded strategic retreat as honourable. For the early Roman declaration of war, cf. I. xxxii. 5–14, which suggests that the view of Livy's contemporaries that Romans had from the first been warriors is a myth due to the later successes in war. Rome's early expansion was caused by a desire for peace, and an inability to accept border raiding as a sport. Cf. also XXXI. viii. 3 and the note, XXXVI. iii. 12 and the note.

[2] Livy's account of the senate's warning to Pyrrhus occurred in the missing book, XIII, cf. the Summary of that book, also Aulus Gellius, III. viii, quoting Valerius Antias and Claudius Quadrigarius; for the story of the treacherous tutor of Falerii, cf. V. xxvii; an allusion to both in XXIV. xlv. 3.

[3] Cf. XXI. iv. 9, XXII. vi. 12, xxii. 15. Cf. Diodorus XXX. 7, ὅτι διασαφούντων τῶν Ῥωμαίων ὡς Περσέα κατεστρατήγησαν ἄνευ ὅπλων ἐπεχείρησάν τινες τῶν ἐκ τῆς βουλῆς ἐπαινεῖν αὐτούς. οὐ μὴν τοῖς πρεσβυτάτοις ἤρεσκε τὸ γεγενημένον ἀλλ' ἔλεγον μὴ πρέπειν Ῥωμαίοις μιμεῖσθαι Φοίνικας, ὥστε δι' ἀπάτης ἀλλ' οὐ δι' ἀρετῆς τῶν πολεμίων περιγίνεσθαι. "When the Romans announced that they had got the better of Perseus without recourse to arms, some of the senators tried to praise them. But what had happened did not please the eldest, but they said that it was not fitting that Romans should imitate Phoenicians, in such a way as to surpass their enemies through deceit and not through valour."

A.U.C. 582 arte neque casu,[1] sed collatis comminus viribus iusto ac pio esse bello superatum.

9 Haec seniores, quibus nova ac nimis callida minus [2] placebat sapientia; vicit tamen ea pars senatus, cui potior utilis [3] quam honesti cura erat, ut comprobaretur prior legatio Marci, et eodem rursus in Graeciam cum . . .[4] quinqueremibus remitteretur iubereturque cetera uti e re publica maxime visum 10 esset agere. A. quoque Atilium miserunt ad occupandam Larisam in Thessalia timentes ne, si indutiarum dies exisset, Perseus [5] praesidio eo misso caput 11 Thessaliae in potestate haberet. Duo milia peditum Atilius ab Cn.[6] Sicinio accersere [7] ad eam rem agendam 12 iussus. Et P. Lentulo qui ex Achaią redierat, trecenti milites Italici generis dati, ut Thebis daret operam, ut in potestate Boeotia esset.

A.U.C. 583 XLVIII. His praeparatis, quamquam ad bellum consilia erant destinata, senatum tamen praeberi 2 legatis placuit. Eadem fere, quae in colloquio ab rege dicta erant, relata ab legatis. Insidiarum Eumeni factarum crimen et maxima cura et minime tamen probabiliter—manifesta enim [8] res erat— 3 defensum; cetera deprecatio erat. Sed non eis animis audiebantur qui aut doceri aut flecti possent.

[1] arte neque casu Fr.: parte neque casus V.
[2] callida minus add. Novák: om. V.
[3] potior utilis Fr.: potior iutilius V.
[4] fortasse numerus excidit (Duker).
[5] Perseus add. Fr. ♦ om. V.
[6] Cn. Fr.: cos(sic) V.
[7] accersere Kreyssig: accensdere (sic) V.
[8] manifesta enim Fr.: manisestenim V.

[1] The number is missing.

quered, not by craft or accident, but by the hand-to- B.C. 172 hand clash of force in a proper and righteous war."

Thus the older men, who were less well pleased by the new and over-sly wisdom; however, that part of the senate to whom the pursuit of advantage was more important than that of honour, prevailed to the effect that the previous embassy of Marcius should be approved, and he should be sent back again to Greece with . . .[1] quinqueremes and instructed to conduct further affairs as might seem best to serve the state. Aulus Atilius, too, they sent to hold Larisa in Thessaly, fearing that if the time of the truce should expire, Perseus might send a garrison there and have in his power the capital of Thessaly. Atilius was instructed to call on Gnaeus Sicinius for two thousand soldiers to accomplish this mission. Publius Lentulus too—he had returned from Achaea—was given three hundred soldiers of Italian stock in order that he should do what he could at Thebes to keep Boeotia under Roman control.

XLVIII. With these preparations made, although B.C. 171 plans for making war had been determined upon, yet it was decided to receive the envoys before the senate.[2] Nearly the same statements as had been made at the conference by the king were presented by his envoys. The charge of setting an ambush for Eumenes was both their chief concern and at the same time—for the situation was obvious—the least plausibly refuted; the rest of what they had to say was mollification. But the envoys were not heard by spirits which could be either enlightened or moved.

[2] A different account of the same event, above, ch. xxxvi. 1–8; this later account follows Polybius, XXVII. 6, πάλαι προδιειλημμένοις ὑπὲρ τοῦ πολεμεῖν and cf. Diodorus, XXX. 1.

A.U.C. 583

Denuntiatum extemplo moenibus urbis Romae, Italia[1] intra tricesimum diem excederent. P. Licinio deinde consuli, cui Macedonia provincia obvenerat, denuntiatum, ut exercitui diem primam quamque diceret ad conveniendum. C. Lucretius praetor, cui classis provincia erat, cum quadraginta quinqueremibus ab urbe profectus; nam ex[2] refectis navibus alias in alium usum retineri ad urbem placuit. Praemissus a praetore est frater M.[3] Lucretius cum quinqueremi[4] una, iussusque ab sociis ex foedere acceptis navibus ad Cephallaniam classi occurrere. Ab Reginis triremi una sumpta,[5] ab Locris duabus, ab Uritibus quattuor, praeter oram Italiae supervectus[6] Calabriae extremum promunturium Ionio[7] mari Dyrrhachium traicit. Ibi decem ipsorum Dyrrhachinorum, duodecim Issaeorum, quinquaginta quattuor Gentii regis lembos nanctus, simulans se credere eos in usum Romanorum comparatos esse, omnibus abductis die tertio Corcyram, inde protinus in Cephallaniam[8] traicit. C. Lucretius praetor ab Neapoli profectus, superato freto, die quinto in[9] Cephallaniam transmisit. Ibi stetit classis, simul opperiens ut

[1] Italia Fr.: ita V.
[2] ex Fr.: rex V.
[3] M. add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[4] quinqueremi Wesenberg: quinquiremesi (sic) V.
[5] sumpta add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[6] Italiae supervectus Fr.: siuperuectus italiae (sic) V.
[7] Ionio Madvig: inionio V.
[8] Cephallaniam Hertz: cepaliam V. sed infra cepallaniam.
[9] in Fr.: per V.

The stern order was given them to depart from the walls of Rome at once, and within thirty days from Italy. Then to the consul Publius Licinius, to whom Macedonia had fallen as province, the order was given that he should appoint the first possible day for the army to assemble. Gaius Lucretius the praetor,[1] whose duty was the command of the fleet, left the city with forty quinqueremes; for it had been decided to keep at the city several of the refitted ships for various purposes. The praetor sent his brother Marcus Lucretius on in advance with one quinquereme, with orders to meet the fleet at Cephallania with the ships received from the allies according to treaty. After taking on one trireme from Rhegium, two from Locri, four from the district of Uria,[2] he coasted along Italy past the farthest cape of Calabria and crossed the Ionian sea to Dyrrhachium. There he came upon ten cutters[3] of the Dyrrhachians themselves, twelve of the Issaeans, and fifty-four of King Gentius, and pretending that he believed they had been collected for the use of the Romans, took them all with him on the third day to Corcyra and thence crossed at once to Cephallania. Gaius Lucretius the praetor set out from Naples, passed through the straits[4] and made the crossing to Cephallania in five days. There the fleet halted, not B.C. 171

[1] Cf. above, ch. xxxv. 3.

[2] Apparently the territory of the Sallentini in the extreme "heel" of Italy, although Uria is an inland town; there was also a Uria nearer the Adriatic in northern Apulia.

[3] Small fast boats, usually undecked, for sail and oars, sometimes sizable, cf. XLIV. xxviii and Polybius II. 3. 1, also Livy XXXII. xxi. 27 and xxxii. 9, XXXIII. xix. 10, XXXV. xxvi. 1. The word lembus seems to mean "sharp."

[4] Of Messina.

A.U.C. 583

terrestres[1] copiae traicerentur, simul ut onerariae ex agmine suo per altum dissipatae consequerentur.

XLIX. Per hos forte dies P. Licinius consul votis in Capitolio nuncupatis paludatus ab urbe profectus est. Semper quidem ea res cum magna dignitate ac maiestate geritur;[2] praecipue convertit oculos animosque, cum ad magnum nobilemque aut virtute aut fortuna hostem euntem consulem prosequuntur. Contrahit enim non officii modo cura sed etiam studium spectaculi, ut videant ducem suum, cuius imperio consilioque summam rem publicam tuendam permiserunt. Subit deinde cogitatio animos[3] qui belli casus, quam incertus fortunae eventus communisque Mars belli sit; adversa secundaque,[4] quae inscitia et temeritate ducum clades saepe acciderint, quae contra bona prudentia et virtus attulerit. Quem scire mortalium, utrius mentis utrius fortunae consulem ad bellum mittant? Triumphantemne mox cum exercitu victore scandentem[5] in Capitolium ad eosdem deos a quibus proficiscatur visuri, an hostibus eam praebituri laetitiam sint? Persei autem regi, adversus quem ibatur, famam et bello clara Macedonum gens et Philippus pater, inter multa prospere gesta Romano etiam nobilitatus bello, praebebat; tum ipsius Persei numquam, ex quo regnum accepis-

[1] ut terrestres Fr.: ut terres ut terrestris (sic) V.
[2] geritur Fr.: quaeritur V.
[3] animos Madvig: animi V.
[4] secundaque Madvig: secundaquaeque V.
[5] scandentem Kreyssig: stantem V.

[1] Polybius XXVII. 7 says that the Rhodians were summoned at this time.

[2] For similar scenes, cf. XXVII. xl, XXIX. xxvi, XLIV. xxii. 17.

only to wait till the land forces were brought over, B.C. 171
but also so that the supply-ships, scattered over the deep off their course, might catch up with it.[1]

XLIX. During these days, as it happened, the consul Publius Licinius, after announcing his vows on the Capitol, set out from the city in military dress. Such a departure is always indeed conducted with great solemnity and pomp; it particularly draws the eyes and minds of men when they escort a consul going against an enemy great and famous either for bravery or for good fortune. For not only care in paying their respects, but also eagerness for the spectacle brings crowds to see their leader, to whose command and wisdom they have entrusted the whole welfare of the state. Thereupon there steals over their minds a thought of the calamities of war, and how uncertain is the outcome of fortune and how impartial the god of war—a thought of reverses and successes, of what disasters have often occurred through the ignorance and rashness of leaders, of what gains, on the other hand, prudence and courage have produced. What mortal knows, men think, which kind of mind and fortune belongs to this consul whom we are sending to war? Shall it be in swift triumph, as he climbs the Capitol with a conquering army toward those gods from whom he now takes his leave, that we shall see him, or are we to give that joy to the enemy?[2] To King Perseus in particular, against whom the consul was going, fame had come from the brilliance of the Macedonian nation in war and from Philip, the king's father, whose reputation sprang from many successful achievements and, besides, even from the war with Rome. Then, too, Perseus' own name, because of the expectation of war with him,

A.U.C. 583 set, desitum belli expectatione celebrari nomen. 8 Cum his cogitationibus[1] omnium ordinum homines 9 proficiscentem consulem prosecuti sunt. Duo consulares tribuni militum cum eo missi, C. Claudius, Q. Mucius, et tres illustres iuvenes, P. Lentulus et duo Manlii Acidini:[2] alter M. Manlii, alter L. Manlii 10 filius erat. Cum iis consul Brundisium ad exercitum profectus[3] atque inde cum omnibus copiis transvectus ad Nymphaeum in Apolloniati agro[4] posuit castra.

L. Paucos ante dies Perseus, postquam legati ab Roma regressi praeciderant spem pacis,[5] consilium habuit. Ibi aliquamdiu[6] diversis sententiis certatum 2 est. Erant quibus vel stipendium pendendum,[7] si iniungeretur, vel agri parte cedendum, si multarent, quidquid denique aliud pacis[8] causa patiendum esset, non recusandum videretur, nec committendum ut in 3 aleam tanti casus se regnumque daret. Si possessio haud ambigua regni maneret, multa diem tempusque afferre posse, quibus non amissa modo recuperare, sed timendus ultro iis esse quos nunc timeret posset. 4 Ceterum multo maior pars ferocioris sententiae erat. Quidquid cessisset, cum eo simul regno protinus 5 cedendum esse affirmabant. Neque enim Romanos pecunia aut agro egere, sed[9] hoc scire cum omnia

[1] cogitationibus Fr.: cogitationum V.
[2] Acidini Fr.: acili V.
[3] profectus add. Madvig: om. V.
[4] Apolloniati agro Fr.: apolliniomagro V.
[5] spem pacis Fr.: spe paucis V.
[6] aliquamdiu Sigonius: aliquam V.
[7] pendendum add. Fr.: om. V.
[8] aliud pacis Fr.: ad aliud paucis V.
[9] agro egere sed Fr.: agrosegeressed V.

never from the time he mounted the throne had ceased to be on men's lips. With such thoughts, men of all classes escorted the departing consul. Two ex-consuls were sent with him as military tribunes, Gaius Claudius and Quintus Mucius[1] and three noted young men, Publius Lentulus and two named Manlius Acidinus—one was the son of Marcus Manlius, the other of Lucius Manlius. With these the consul left for the army at Brundisium and crossing thence with all his forces, pitched camp near the Place of the Nymphs[2] in the territory of Apollonia. B.C. 171

L. A few days before, after the envoys returning from Rome had cut off hope of peace, Perseus held a council. There a contest of opposing views took place for a time. There were those who thought that either a tribute should be paid, if it were imposed, or part of their territory yielded, if this form of fine were inflicted—or, finally, that anything else which must be endured for the sake of peace should not be rejected, nor should the king risk staking himself and his kingdom on a cast with so great a forfeit. If his hold on the kingdom remained quite undisputed, the passage of time might bring, they thought, many means not only of recouping his losses but of making him positively an object of fear to those whom he now feared. However, by far the majority held a bolder opinion. No matter what he should have yielded, they declared, along with it he would immediately have to yield his kingdom. For the Romans were not in want of money or territory, but

[1] Consuls in 177 and 174 B.C. respectively; for Mucius' part in the campaign, cf. below, ch. lviii. 13, and lxvii. 9, where he has been promoted to legatus.

[2] Cf. above, ch. xxxvi. 6 and n. 3.

A.U.C. 583

humana tum maxima quaeque et regna et imperia
6 sub casibus multis esse. Carthaginiensium opes fregisse sese, et cervicibus eorum praepotentem finitimum regem imposuisse; Antiochum progeniem-
7 que eius ultra iuga Tauri emotum;[1] unum esse Macedoniae regnum, et regione propinquum, et quod, sicubi[2] populo Romano sua fortuna labet, antiquos
8 animos regibus suis videatur posse facere. Dum integrae res sint, statuere[3] apud animum suum Persea debere, utrum singula concedendo nudatus ad extremum opibus extorrisque regno Samothraciam aliamve quam insulam petere ab Romanis, ubi privatus superstes regno suo in contemptu atque inopia
9 consenescat, malit, an[4] armatus vindex fortunae dignitatisque suae aut, ut[5] viro forti dignum sit, patiatur quodcumque casus belli tulerit, aut victor liberet[6] orbem terrarum ab imperio Romano.
10 Non esse admirabilius Romanos Graecia pelli quam Hannibalem Italia pulsum esse. Neque hercule videre qui conveniat, fratri affectanti per iniuriam regnum summa vi restitisse, alienigenis bene parto
11 eo cedere. Postremo ita de[7] bello et pace quaeri ut inter omnes conveniat, nec turpius quicquam esse quam sine certamine cessisse regno nec praeclarius

[1] emotum J. F. Gronovius: ermotum V.
[2] sicubi Fr.: quiasictibi V.
[3] res sint statuere add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[4] malit an Fr.: militaria V.
[5] ut add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[6] liberet Fr.: liberart (sic) V.
[7] de add. Madvig: om. V.

[1] Masinissa.
[2] Perhaps in anticipation of the actual flight of Perseus thither, cf. XLIV. xlv. 15, XLV. v; as a sacred island, Samothrace was particularly appropriate as an asylum.

understood that not only all human affairs, but in B.C. 171 particular the greatest of kingdoms and empires, were subject to many vicissitudes. The Romans, said these advisers, knew that they had shattered the power of the Carthaginians and had set upon their necks a very powerful royal neighbour;[1] Antiochus and his line had been driven beyond the range of Taurus; only the kingdom of Macedonia remained, both near in situation, and such that, when in any way its good fortune began to fail the Roman people, it might seem able to inspire its kings with the spirit of their ancestors. While his strength was intact, Perseus ought to make up his mind whether, after being stripped, by concession after concession, of his resources, and thrust from his kingdom, he would prefer finally to beg of the Romans Samothrace[2] or some other island, where as an untitled survivor of his own kingdom he might grow old amid scorn and poverty, or whether, armed in defense of his power and high position, he would either, in a fashion worthy of a brave man, endure whatever the fortune of war might bring, or as conqueror free the world from Roman domination. It would be no more astounding for the Romans to be driven from Greece than for Hannibal to have been driven from Italy. Nor in truth could they see how it was consistent to resist with the utmost vehemence a brother who was wrongly laying claim to the kingdom, and then, when the kingdom had been securely won, to yield it to aliens. Finally this discussion about peace and war was based on the universally accepted view that nothing is more disgraceful than to have yielded a kingdom without a struggle, nor anything more quam [1] pro dignitate ac maiestate omnem fortunam expertum esse.

A.U.C. 583

LI. Pellae, in vetere regia Macedonum, hoc consilium erat. "Geramus ergo" inquit, "dis bene iuvantibus, quando ita videtur, bellum;" litterisque [2] circa praefectos dimissis, Citium—Macedoniae oppi-
2 dum est—copias omnes contrahit. Ipse [3] centum hostiis sacrificio regaliter Minervae, quam vocant Alcidemon, facto [4] cum purpuratorum et satellitum manu profectus Citium est. Eo iam omnes Macedonum et [5] externorum auxiliorum convenerant
3 copiae. Castra ante urbem ponit omnisque armatos [6] in campo instruxit; [7] summa omnium quadraginta tria [8] milia armata fuere; quorum pars ferme dimidia
4 phalangitae erant; Hippias Beroeaeus praeerat. Delecta deinde et viribus et robore aetatis ex omni caetratorum numero duo milia [9] erant: agema hanc ipsi legionem vocabant; praefectos habebat Leon-
5 natum et Thrasippum Eulyestas. Ceterorum caetra-

[1] quam Weissenborn: quicquam V, quicquam quam Fr.
[2] litterisque Fr.: ut terrisquae V.
[3] contrahit ipse Fr.: contra ipsa V.
[4] Alcidemon facto Kreyssig: alcidem confacto V.
[5] et add. Vahlen: om. V.
[6] omnesque armatos Fr.: omnis armatosque V.
[7] instruxit J. F. Gronovius: struxit V.
[8] tria add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[9] milia add. Kreyssig: om. V.

[1] The form usually assigned in the Latin to this title of Athena is Alcis, not Alcidemos.
[2] I.e., nobles attendant on the king, cf. XXX. xlii. 6, XXXI. xxxv. 1, XXXVII, xxiii. 7, lix. 5.
[3] Cf. XXXVI. xviii. 2, XXXVII. xl. 1.

glorious than to have made trial of fortune to the utmost in defense of rank and crown. B.C. 171

LI. This conference was held at Pella, in the ancient palace of the Macedonians. "Let us, then," said Perseus, "wage war, since this seems best, with the kindly help of the gods," and sending dispatches to his officers he drew all his forces together at Citium, a city of Macedonia. He himself offered a sacrifice of one hundred victims in regal style to Minerva whom they call "Defender of the Folk,"[1] and set out for Citium with a band of wearers of the purple[2] and attendants. There all the forces of Macedonians and foreign auxiliaries had already assembled. He pitched camp before the city and drew up all the soldiers on the plain; the total of all was forty-three thousand under arms; about half of these were phalanx-men;[3] Hippias of Beroea[4] was their commander. Then there were two thousand chosen from all the force of light infantry[5] for their strength and the vigour of their youth; this unit the Macedonians called the Guard;[6] its commanders were Leonnatus and Thrasippus, Eulyestans.[7] The leader

[4] This town was of importance, notably in Christian times, and through the Middle Ages. Its name survives in the form Verria in modern Greek, Berea in English.

[5] For caetrati cf. XXXI. xxxvi. 1 and the note, also XXVIII. v. 11. These "peltasts" (the Greek term) first came into use in the Peloponnesian War, and were made important by Iphicrates of Athens early in the fourth century; they were conspicuous, as here, in the army of Alexander the Great. They were armed with helmet, shield, long spear and sword.

[6] Cf. Polybius V. 65.2, 84. 7; Arrian, Anabasis, II 8.3, III. 11. 9.

[7] The name of this people is not found elsewhere, and is probably corrupt. Weissenborn conjectures Elymiotas, or Lyncestas.

A.U.C. 583

torum, trium ferme milium hominum, dux erat Antiphilus Edessaeus. Paeones et ex Paroria et Parastrymonia—sunt autem ea loca subiecta Thraciae—et Agrianes, admixtis etiam Thracibus incolis, trium milium ferme et ipsi expleverant numerum. 6 Armaverat contraxeratque eos Didas Paeon, qui 7 adulescentem Demetrium occiderat. Et armatorum duo milia Gallorum erant; praefectus Asclepiodotus ab Heraclea ex Sintis;[1] tria milia Thracum liberorum suum ducem habebant. Cretensium par ferme[2] numerus suos duces sequebatur Susum Phalasarnaeum 8 et Syllum Gnosium. Et Leonides Lacedaemonius quingentis ex Graecia, mixto[3] generi hominum, praeerat. Regii is generis ferebatur, exul, damnatus frequenti concilio Achaeorum litteris ad Persea 9 deprensis. Aetolorum et Boeotorum, qui non explebant plus quam quingentorum omnes numerum, Lyco Achaeus praefectus erat. Ex his mixtis tot populorum, tot gentium auxiliis duodecim milia armatorum ferme efficiebantur. Equitum ex tota 10 Macedonia contraxerat tria[4] milia. Venerat eodem Cotys, Seuthis[5] filius, rex gentis Odrysarum, cum mille delectis equitibus, pari ferme peditum numero. 11 Ita summa totius exercitus triginta novem milia[6] peditum erant, quattuor equitum. Satis constabat,

[1] Sintis Hartel: intris V.
[2] par ferme Novák: parmene V.
[3] Graecia mixto Fr.: graeciam misso V.
[4] tria add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] Cotys (Cothys) Seuthis Hertz: coteseuthis V.
[6] milia add. Fr.: om. V.

[1] Cf. XXXIX. xxvii. 10.
[2] Regular auxiliaries of the Macedonians, cf. XXVIII. v. 12, XXXIII. xviii. 9, Arrian, I. l. 11, etc.

of the other light infantry, about three thousand men, B.C. 171 was Antiphilus of Edessa. The Paeonians from the districts both of the Mountainside[1] and of the Strymon Valley—these places march with Thrace—and the Agrianes,[2] with an admixture, besides, of Thracian settlers, also supplied a contingent of nearly three thousand. Didas the Paeonian, who had killed young Demetrius,[3] had armed and mustered them. There were also two thousand Gauls[4] under arms; their commander was Asclepiodotus from Heraclea of the Sintians; three thousand free Thracians were under their own commander. About an equal number of Cretans followed native leaders, Susus of Phalasarnae and Syllus of Knossus. Leonides too, the Lacedaemonian, commanded five hundred from Greece, a mixed group of men. He was said to be of the royal blood, an exile, condemned by a full council of the Achaeans because of dispatches to Perseus which had been intercepted. Lycon the Achaean was commander of the Aetolians and Boeotians, who amounted in all to not more than five hundred. Of these auxiliaries, made up of so many peoples and tribes, the total under arms came to about twelve thousand. Of cavalry, the king had assembled three thousand from all Macedonia. To Citium had come Cotys,[5] son of Seuthes, king of the tribe of the Odrysae, with one thousand picked cavalry and about an equal number of infantry. Thus the total of the whole army was thirty-nine thousand infantry and four thousand cavalry. It was generally agreed that,

[2] Cf. XL. xxii. 15–xxiv; Didas was governor of Paeonia.
[4] Either from Asia Minor, or, more probably, from Pannonia (northern Jugoslavia).
[5] Cf. above xxix. 12 and the note.

A.U.C. 583 secundum eum exercitum, quem magnus Alexander in Asiam traiecit, numquam ullius Macedonum regis copias tantas fuisse.

LII. Sextus et vicesimus annus agebatur, ex quo petenti Philippo data pax erat; per id omne tempus quieta Macedonia et progeniem ediderat, cuius[1] magna pars matura militiae esset, et levibus bellis Thracum accolarum, quae exercerent magis quam fatigarent, sub assidua tamen militia fuerat. Et diu meditatum Philippo primo, deinde et Persei Romanum bellum, omnia ut instructa parataque essent effecerat.

Mota[2] parumper acies, non iusto decursu tamen, ne stetisse tantum in armis viderentur; armatosque, sicut erant, ad contionem vocavit. Ipse constitit in tribunali, circa se habens filios duos, quorum maior[3] Philippus natura frater, adoptione filius, minor, quem Alexandrum vocabant, naturalis erat. Cohortatus est milites ad bellum; iniurias[4] populi Romani in patrem seque commemoravit:[5] illum omnibus indignitatibus[6] compulsum ad rebellandum, inter apparatum belli fato oppressum; ad se simul legatos, simul milites ad occupandas Graeciae urbes missos. Fallaci dein[7] colloquio per speciem reconciliandae

[1] cuius Fr.: cuius macedonia V.
[2] effecerat. mota Fr.: effecerant motam V.
[3] quorum maior Fr.: cuius uel quorum pars V.
[4] iniurias Crévier: iniuriam V.
[5] seque commemoravit Fr.: seomnemorauit V.
[6] indignitatibus Fr.: dignitationibus V.
[7] dein Bekker: deindein V.

[1] Livy's estimate of Alexander's available strength in IX. xix. 5 was not so large. Arrian, Anabasis I. 11. 3 gives except for the army which Alexander the Great took B.C. 171 over to Asia,[1] never had the forces of any Macedonian king been so great.

LII. The twenty-sixth year was passing, since peace had been granted to Philip at his request; throughout all that time unmolested Macedonia had both produced offspring, a large number of whom were of military age, and yet, in minor wars with her Thracian neighbours, of a sort to give training rather than to produce weariness, had been unremittingly in arms. Also the long planning for war with Rome, first by Philip, then by Perseus, had brought it about that everything was ready and at hand.

The array of the review was set briefly in motion (not however in a regular manoeuvre[2]), so that they might not seem to have merely stood under arms; the king summoned them, in arms as they were, to an assembly. He himself stood on a platform, having about him his two sons, the elder of whom, Philip, was by birth his brother, by adoption his son, while the younger, whom they called Alexander, was his own.[3] He cheered the soldiers on to the war; he recited the wrongs done by the Roman people to his father and himself; the former had been driven by all sorts of outrages to fight back, but had been overtaken by fate during preparations for the war; to Perseus himself envoys had been sent at the same moment as soldiers for the seizing of the cities of Greece. Then through a treacherous conference, by means of a pretence of reorganizing peace, the Alexander an original strength of somewhat over 35000, corresponding with Livy IX.

[2] Cf. XL. vi. 5–7.

[3] Cf. Plutarch, Aemilius Paullus, xxxiii. 3–4 and xxxvii. 3.

A.U.C. 583

pacis extractam hiemem, ut tempus ad comparandum haberent; consulem nunc venire cum duabus legionibus Romanis, quae singulae sena milia peditum,[1] trecenos[2] equites habeant, et pari ferme numero sociorum peditum equitumque. Eo ut accedant 9 regum auxilia, Eumenis et Masinissae, non plus triginta[3] septem milia peditum, duo equitum futura. 10 Auditis hostium copiis respicerent suum ipsi exercitum, quantum numero quantum genere militum praestarent tironibus raptim ad id bellum conscriptis ipsi, a pueris eruditi artibus militiae, tot subacti atque 11 durati bellis. Auxilia Romanis Lydos et Phrygas et Numidas esse, sibi Thracas Gallosque, ferocissimas gentium. Arma illos habere[4] ea quae sibi quisque paraverit pauper miles, Macedonas prompta ex regio apparatu, per tot annos patris sui cura et impensa 12 facta. Commeatum illis cum procul, tum omnibus sub casibus maritimis fore; se et pecuniam et frumentum, praeter reditus metallorum, in decem annos 13 seposuisse. Omnia quae deorum indulgentia, quae regia cura praeparanda fuerint,[5] plena cumulataque 14 habere Macedonas; animos habendos esse quos[6]

[1] singulae . . . peditum add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[2] trecenos Sigonius: tricenos V.
[3] triginta add. H. J. Mueller: om. V.
[4] illos habere Fr.: armatplios V.
[5] fuerint Duker: fuerant V.
[6] animos habendos esse quos Vahlen: animum hos habendum esse quem V.

[1] Traditionally regarded as effeminate and slavish by Greeks and Romans; the Lydians were said to have been made unwarlike, to prevent uprisings, by Cyrus the Great; on advice of their ex-king Croesus, he had forbidden them arms and made them become merchants and musicians (Herodotus I. 155). Cf. XXXVIII. xvii. 13, and the note.

winter had been wasted, so that the Romans might B.C. 171 have time for preparation; now the consul was coming with two Roman legions, each of which contained six thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry, and about the same number of allied infantry and cavalry. Supposing that there were added to this force auxiliaries from the kings, Eumenes and Masinissa, there would be not more than thirty-seven thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry. Now that they had heard the numbers of the enemy let them consider their own army, how much it excelled in numbers and in type of soldiers, how much they, trained in the arts of warfare from boyhood, disciplined and hardened in so many wars, excelled these recruits hastily enrolled for this war. The auxiliaries of the Romans were Lydians, Phrygians,[1] and Numidians; their own, Thracians and Gauls, the most warlike of all nations. Their enemies had such arms as each poverty-stricken soldier might have acquired for himself,[2] the Macedonians had arms taken from the royal arsenals, laid up through so many years by his father's care and expenditure. Provisions for the enemy would come not only from a long distance, but subject to all the accidents of seafaring; he himself had stored up both money and grain, not counting the revenue from the mines, for a ten years' war.[3] Everything which, by the beneficence of the gods and by the prudence of the king, was to be made ready the Macedonians had in abundant plenty; they must have, too, the spirit

[2] The state, however, supplied arms in case of need, and in wartime presumably had replacements in its arsenals, cf. XXIX. xxii. 3.

[3] So also Justinus, XXXIII. 1. 3: Perseo . . . decennis belli sumptus a patre paratus in thesauris et horreis erat.

A.U.C. 583

habuerint maiores eorum, qui Europa omni domita transgressi in Asiam [1] incognitum famae aperuerint armis orbem terrarum nec ante vincere desierint quam Rubro mari inclusis quod vincerent,defuerit. 15 At hercule nunc non [2] de ultimis Indiae oris sed de ipsius Macedoniae possessione certamen fortunam indixisse. Cum patre suo gerentes bellum Romanos speciosum Graeciae liberandae praetulisse [3] titulum: 16 nunc propalam Macedoniam in servitutem petere, ne rex vicinus imperio sit Romano, ne gens bello nobilis arma habeat. Haec enim tradenda superbis dominis esse cum rege regnoque, si [4] absistere bello et facere imperata velint.

LIII. Cum per omnem orationem satis frequenti assensu succlamatum esset, tum vero ea vociferatio simul indignantium minitantiumque, partim iubentium bonum animum habere regem, exorta est ut finem dicendi faceret, tantum iussis ad iter se 2 parare; [5] iam enim dici movere castra ab Nymphaeo Romanos. Contione [6] dimissa ad audiendas legationes civitatium Macedoniae se contulit. 3 Venerant autem ad pecunias pro facultatibus quaeque suis et frumentum pollicendum ad bellum. 4 Omnibus gratiae actae, remissum omnibus; satis

[1] Asiam Fr.: Italiam V.
[2] non add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] praetulisse J. F. Gronovius: tulisse V.
[4] si add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] se parare Wesenberg: parere V.
[6] contione add. Fr.: om. V.

which their ancestors had possessed, who, having B.C. 171 subdued all Europe, had crossed to Asia and opened up with their arms a whole world unknown even to rumour, and had not ceased their conquests, until, within the barrier of the Indian Ocean,[1] there was nothing left for them to conquer. But now, by Hercules, fortune had proclaimed a contest, not for the farthermost shores of India, but for the possession of Macedonia itself. When the Romans had been waging war with his father, they had held out the plausible pretext of the freedom of Greece; now openly they sought to enslave Macedonia, that there might be no king neighbouring the Roman empire, that no people famed in war might keep its arms. All these things they must surrender to haughty masters, along with their king and kingdom, if they wished to cease waging war and do the bidding of others.

LIII. Although throughout all the speech there had been often enough outbursts of applause, at that moment indeed such an outcry arose from those who were at once enraged and threatening, while some of them bade the king be of good cheer, that he put an end to his speech, merely ordering them to prepare for a march, for it was reported that the Romans had already moved camp from the Place of the Nymphs. After dismissing the assembly he turned to hearing embassies from the cities of Macedonia. These groups had come in order to promise funds for the war, each according to its ability, and grain. To all thanks were expressed and the offers refused;

[1] The "Red Sea" usually meant to a Roman the Persian Gulf, but cf. below, ultimis Indiae oris; the Indian Ocean had perhaps no separate name current in Livy's day; Roman seafaring in those waters came later.

A.U.C. 583

regios[1] apparatus ad ea dictum sufficere. Vehicula tantum imperata, ut tormenta telorumque missilium ingentem vim praeparatam bellicumque aliud instrumentum veherent.

5 Profectus inde toto exercitu, Eordaeam[2] petens, ad Begorritim quem vocant lacum positis castris, postero die in Elimeam ad Haliacmona fluvium processit. 6 Deinde saltu angusto superatis montibus quos Cambunios vocant descendit ad Azorum, Pythoum, 7 Dolichen; Tripolim vocant incolentes. Haec tria oppida paulisper cunctati, quia obsides Larisaeis dederant, victi tamen praesenti metu in deditionem 8 concesserunt. Benigne his appellatis, haud dubius Perrhaebos quoque idem facturos,[3] . . . .[4] urbem nihil cunctatis, qui incolebant, primo adventu recipit. 9 Cyretias oppugnare coactus primo[5] die acri concursu ad portas armatorum est repulsus; postero die omnibus copiis adortus in deditionem omnes ante noctem accepit.

LIV. Mylae, proximum oppidum, ita munitum ut inexsuperabilis munimenti spes incolas ferociores faceret, non portas claudere regi satis habuerunt, sed probris quoque in ipsum Macedonasque prōcaci- 2 bus iaculati sunt. Quae res cum infestiorem hostem ad oppugnandum fecisset, ipsos desperatione veniae 3 ad tuendos sese acrius accendit. Itaque per triduum

[1] regios Fr.: regionibus V.
[2] Eordaeam Drakenborch: sordeam V.
[3] facturos add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] lacunam indicavit Crévier, nomen civitatis excidisse persuasus.
[5] primo Zingerle: primo etiam V.

[1] The route chosen led west, then south, avoiding mountain narrows as far as possible, and taking the western pass to the Tripolis.

they were informed that the royal stores were sufficient for these purposes. Only wagons were ordered, to carry the catapults and a huge supply of missile weapons which was ready and other martial equipment. B.C. 171

Setting out from there with the whole army, by way of Eordaea,[1] the king arrived on the second day, after pitching camp at the lake called Begorritis, at the Haliacmon river in Elimea. Then crossing the mountains which they call Cambunian by a narrow pass, he came down to Azorus, Pythoüs and Dolichê; the inhabitants call them Tripolis. These three towns, after brief hesitation because they had given hostages to the people of Larisa, nevertheless, overcome by immediate fear, yielded in surrender. After reassuring speeches to these, Perseus, not doubting that the Perrhaebians also would do the same . . .[2] at once on his arrival received the surrender of the city with no delay on the part of the inhabitants. Forced to besiege Cyretiae, he was repulsed the first day by a sharp rally of fighters at the gates; on the next day, by attacking with all his forces, he received before nightfall the surrender of everyone.

LIV. Mylae, the next town, being so fortified that their hope that the defences were impregnable made the inhabitants overbold, considered it insufficient to shut its gates to the king, but also assailed him and the Macedonians with saucy insults. This impertinence both made the enemy more vehement in the attack and fired the citizens, through despair of obtaining pardon, to defend themselves more vigorously. Therefore for three ingentibus utrimque animis et oppugnata est urbs et [1] defensa. Multitudo Macedonum ad subeundum in vicem proelium haud difficulter suppetebat; [2] oppidanos, diem noctem eosdem tuentes moenia, non vulnera modo sed etiam vigiliae et continens

[2] Perhaps only the name of the city (Malloea? cf. below, ch. lxvii. 7) is missing.

A.U.C. 583

4 labor conficiebat. Quarto die cum et [3] scalae undique ad muros erigerentur et porta vi maiore oppugnaretur, oppidani depulsa vi muris [4] ad portam tuendam concurrunt eruptionemque repentinam in hostis
5 faciunt; quae cum irae magis inconsultae quam verae fiduciae virium esset, pauci et fessi [5] ab integris pulsi terga dederunt [6] fugientesque per patentem
6 portam hostes acceperunt. Ita capta urbs ac direpta est; libera quoque corpora quae caedibus superfuerunt [7] venum data. Diruto magna ex parte et incenso oppido profectus ad Phalannam castra movit,
7 inde postero die Gyrtonem pervenit. Quo cum T. Minucium Rufum et Hippiam, Thessalorum praetorem, cum praesidio intrasse accepisset, ne temptata [8] quidem oppugnatione praetergressus, Elatiam et Gonnum perculsis inopinato adventu oppidanis
8 recepit. Utraque oppida in faucibus sunt qua Tempe adeuntur,[9] magis Gonnus. Itaque [10] et firmiore id praesidio tutum equitumque, ad hoc fossa
9 triplici ac vallo munitum reliquit. Ipse ad Sycurium progressus opperiri ibi hostium adventum statuit;

[1] urbs et add. Madvig : om. V.
[2] suppetebat Madvig : sedebat V. [3] et Fr. : et cum V.
[4] depulsa vi muris Madvig : depulmoris V.
[5] et fessi Fr. : effusi V.
[6] dederunt add. Fr. : om. V.
[7] superfuerunt Fr. : sublperfuereunt (sic) V.
[8] tentata Fr. : pugnata V.
[9] Tempe adeuntur J. F. Gronovius : tempestate adeunt V.
[10] Gonnus itaque Sigonius : conustaque et V.

days with great spirit on both sides the city was B.C. 171 attacked and defended. The numbers of the Macedonians were easily sufficient to undertake the battle in relays; the townspeople, guarding the walls day and night without relief, were worn out not only by wounds but also by wakefulness and unbroken toil. When on the fourth day ladders were lifted against the walls on all sides and also the gate was attacked with greater violence, the townspeople, after thrusting back the assault on the walls, rallied to guard the gate and made a sudden sally against the enemy; this being more the result of heedless rage than of genuine confidence in their strength, the small number of weary men, routed by fresh opponents, turned tail and in their flight let the enemy in through the open gate. Thus the city was captured and sacked; even the free persons who survived the slaughter were sold. After the town had been in large part torn down and burned, Perseus, departing, moved his camp to Phalanna [1] and thence on the next day arrived at Gyrton. When he heard that Titus Minucius Rufus and Hippias, general of the Thessalians, had entered that town with a garrison, he passed by without even trying an attack and received the submission of Elatia and Gonnus because the inhabitants were frightened by his unexpected arrival. Both towns are in the narrows by which Tempê is approached, especially Gonnus. Therefore he left this town both protected by a stronger garrison of cavalry and infantry and fortified in addition by a triple ditch and a rampart. He himself having advanced to Sycurium decided to await there the approach of the enemy; at the [1] Perseus now turns east, then north-east.

A.U.C. 583 simul et frumentari passim exercitum iubet in subiecto
10 hostium agro. Namque Sycurium est sub radicibus Ossae montis. Is,[1] qua in meridiem vergit, subiectos habet Thessaliae campos, ab tergo Macedoniam atque 11 Magnesiam. Ad has opportunitates accedit summa salubritas et copia pluribus circumiectis fontibus perennium aquarum.

LV. Consul Romanus, per eosdem dies Thessaliam cum exercitu petens, iter expeditum primo per 2 Epirum habuit; deinde, postquam in Athamaniam est transgressus, asperi ac prope invii soli,[2] cum ingenti difficultate parvis itineribus aegre Gomphos
3 pervenit; cui si vexatis hominibus equisque tironem exercitum ducenti acie instructa et loco suo et tempore obstitisset rex, ne Romani quidem abnuunt
4 magna sua cum clade fuisse[3] pugnaturos. Postquam Gomphos sine certamine ventum est, praeter gaudium periculosi saltus superati, contemptus quoque hostium adeo ignorantium opportunitates
5 suas accessit. Sacrificio rite perfecto consul et frumento dato militibus paucos ad requiem iumentorum hominumque moratus dies, cum audiret vagari Macedonas effusos per Thessaliam vastarique sociorum agros, satis iam refectum militem ad
6 Larisam ducit. Inde cum tria milia ferme abesset,

[1] Is add. Madvig : om. V.
[2] asperi ac prope invii soli Fr. : asperis ac prope iniu solis V.
[3] clade fuisse Fr. : clade uisse V.

[1] This criticism ignores the difficulties which Perseus would have suffered had he tried to oppose the Romans in Athamania; in the mountains his strongest arm, the phalanx, was useless, and his cavalry might well have been hobbled; the problem of supplies and communications would have been complicated by the mountains between him and Macedonia; and his same time he ordered his army to gather grain B.C. 171

everywhere in the adjoining hostile territory. For Sycurium is in the foothills of Mount Ossa. This mountain by its southern slope commands the plains of Thessaly, and to the rear, Macedonia and Magnesia. To these advantages of position are added the greatest healthfulness and an abundance of unfailing water, since numerous springs surround it.

LV. The Roman consul, being on his way to Thessaly with his army during these same days, first made a rapid march through Epirus; then, after he crossed into Athamania, a land of rough and almost pathless terrain, with great difficulty by small roads he barely got through to Gomphi; while his men and horses were in trouble, and since he commanded a novice army, if the king had opposed him with a force advantageously arrayed as to time and place, even the Romans do not deny that they would have fought with great loss to themselves. After their arrival at Gomphi without opposition, besides the joy of having negotiated a dangerous pass, scorn of enemies who were so ignorant of their own advantages also came to them.[1] After sacrifice duly performed and a distribution of grain to the soldiers, the consul, delaying a few days to rest beasts and men, on hearing that the Macedonians were wandering scattered through Thessaly and that the territory of the allies was being plundered, led his now sufficiently refreshed soldiery to Larisa. When about three miles distant strategic flank would have been wide open to hostile Thessaly. His actual march left him with direct communication with Macedonia, the flanking passes to the west guarded, and ground before him level enough for his type of fighting.

a.u.c. 583

ad Tripolim[1]—Scaeam vocant—super Peneum
7 amnem posuit castra. Per idem tempus Eumenes ad Chalcidem navibus accessit cum Attalo atque Athenaeo fratribus, Philetaero fratre relicto Pergami
8 ad tutelam regni. Chalcide cum Attalo et quattuor milibus peditum, mille equitum ad consulem venit; Chalcide relicta duo milia peditum, quibus Athenaeus praepositus.[2] Et alia eodem auxilia Romanis ex omnibus undique Graeciae populis convenerunt, quorum pleraque—adeo parva erant[3]—in oblivionem
9 adducta. Apolloniatae trecentos equites centum pedites miserunt. Aetolorum alae unius instar,
10 quantum ab[4] tota gente equitum[5] erat venerant, et Thessalorum, quorum[6] omnis equitatus speratus[7] erat, non plus quam trecenti erant equites[8] in castris Romanis. Achaei iuventutis suae, Cretico maxime armatu, ad mille quingentos dederunt.

LVI. Sub idem tempus et C. Lucretius praetor, qui navibus praeerat ad Cephallaniam, M. Lucretio fratre cum classe super Maleum Chalcidem iusso petere, ipse triremem conscendit, sinum Corinthium
2 petens ad praeoccupandas in Boeotia res. Tardior ei navigatio propter infirmitatem corporis fuit.
3 M. Lucretius, Chalcidem adveniens, cum a P. Lentulo Haliartum oppugnari audisset, nuntium, [1] abesset ad Tripolim J. F. Gronovius: adesse ai tripoli (sic) V.

[2] praepositus et alia Fr.: praetor praepositus alia et V.
[3] parva erant Fr.: paruerunt V. [4] ab Fr.: ad V.
[5] equitum Fr.: equitem V.
[6] quorum add. Drakenborch: om. V.
[7] speratus Drakenborch: partus V.
[8] equites Fr.: adquei (sic) V.

[1] About 500 men. [2] Below lviii. 14, there are 400 present.
[3] I.e. as slingers and other light troops.

from there, at Tripolis—they call it Scaea—above the B.C. 171
Peneüs river he pitched camp. During this same time Eumenes arrived at Chalcis with a fleet, accompanied by his brothers Attalus and Athenaeus, his brother Philetaerus having been left at Pergamum for the protection of the kingdom. From Chalcis he came with Attalus and four thousand infantry and a thousand cavalry to the consul; at Chalcis two thousand infantry were left under the command of Athenaeus. Also the other auxiliaries of the Romans assembled at Tripolis from all the peoples of Greece everywhere, many of whom—so small were they—have come to oblivion. The people of Apollonia sent three hundred cavalry and one hundred infantry. From the Aetolians there came the equivalent of one squadron,[1] the total force of cavalry of the whole league, and of the Thessalians, whose entire cavalry force had been hoped for, not more than three hundred horsemen[2] were in the Roman camp. The Achaeans contributed of their young men, mostly with Cretan armament,[3] about fifteen hundred.

LVI. At about the same time Gaius Lucretius too, the praetor who commanded the ships at Cephallania, ordering his brother Marcus Lucretius to make for Chalcis around Malea with the fleet, himself embarked on a trireme, sailing for the Corinthian Gulf in order to be the first in the field in Boeotia. His voyage was somewhat slow because of his bodily weakness. Marcus Lucretius, on his arrival at Chalcis, hearing that Haliartus was being besieged by Publius Lentulus,[4] sent a messenger praetoris verbis qui abscedere eum inde iuberet, misit. Boeotorum iuventute, quae pars cum Romanis stabat, eam rem aggressus legatus a moenibus abscessit. Haec soluta obsidio [1] locum alteri novae obsidioni dedit; namque extemplo M. Lucretius cum exercitu navali, decem milibus armatorum, ad hoc duobus milibus regiorum, qui sub Athenaeo erant, Haliartum circumsedit; parantibusque iam oppugnare supervenit a Creusa praetor. Ad idem fere [2] tempus et ab sociis naves Chalcidem convenerunt, duae Punicae quinqueremes, duae ab Heraclea ex Ponto triremes, quattuor Chalcedone, totidem Samo, tum quinque Rhodiae quadriremes. Has praetor, quia nusquam erat maritimum bellum, remisit sociis. Et Q. Marcius Chalcidem navibus venit, Alope Phthiotica [3] capta, Larisa, quae Cremaste dicitur, oppugnata.

[4] Roman garrison-commander at Thebes, in charge of Boeotia, cf. above xlvii. 12. Haliartus commanded the pass between eastern and western Boeotia.

A.U.C. 583

Cum hic status in [4] Boeotia esset, Perseus, cum ad Sycurium, sicut ante dictum est, stativa haberet, frumento undique circa ex agris convecto, ad vastandum Pheraeorum agrum [5] misit, ratus ad iuvandas sociorum urbes longius a castris abstractos deprehendi Romanos posse. Quos cum eo tumultu nihil motos animadvertisset, praedam quidem praeterquam hominum—pecora autem maxime omnis generis fuere—divisit [6] ad epulandum militibus.[7]

[1] obsidio Fr.: obsidio cuius V. [2] fere Fr.: facere V.
[3] Alope Phthiotica Madvig: halopetica V.
[4] in Fr.: inhisin V.
[5] agrum add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[6] divisit Fr.: dimisit V.
[7] lacunam post animadvertisset susp. Madvig, post militibus Weissenborn, neutrubi ego.

[1] The port of Thespiae, on the Corinthian Gulf.
[2] Cf. Polybius XXVII. 7. 14–16.

to order him in the name of the praetor to depart B.C. 171 from there. The commissioner, who had undertaken this enterprise with the Boeotian young men of the party supporting the Romans, departed from the walls. The raising of this siege gave room for another new siege; for immediately Marcus Lucretius with the naval force, ten thousand men-at-arms, and in addition the two thousand king's men who were under Athenaeus, blockaded Haliartus; and while they were preparing also to assault it, the praetor joined them from Creüsa.[1] At about the same time ships from the allies also assembled at Chalcis—two Carthaginian quinqueremes, two triremes from Heraclea on the Euxine, four from Chalcedon, as many from Samos, and also five quadriremes from Rhodes.[2] These, since there was no naval warfare in any quarter, the praetor sent back to the allies. Quintus Marcius also came to Chalcis with ships, after capturing Alopê in Phthiotis and attacking Larisa which is called Cremastê.[3]

While this was the situation in Boeotia, and Perseus, as has been said above, had his permanent camp at Sycurium, after all the grain had been brought in from the fields round about, he sent a force to devastate the territory of Pherae, thinking that thus he might catch the Romans drawn a rather long distance from their camp for the purpose of aiding the cities of their allies. When he discovered that they had not stirred at all because of this raid, he divided all the booty at least, only the human beings excepted—it consisted chiefly of all sorts of livestock—among his soldiers for feasting.

[3] I.e. "Hanging Larisa," cf. above xlii. 1, and below lxvii. 10.

A.U.C. 583

LVII. Sub idem deinde tempus consilium et consul et rex habuerunt, unde bellum ordirentur. Regiis[1] creverant[2] animi vastatione concessa sibi ab hoste Pheraei agri; itaque eundum inde ad castra nec dandum ultra spatium cunctandi censebant. Et Romani sentiebant[3] cunctationem suam infamem apud socios esse, maxime indigne ferentes non latam Pheraeis opem. Consultantibus, quid agerent—aderant autem Eumenes et Attalus in consilio—trepidus nuntius adfert hostem magno agmine adesse. Consilio dimisso signum extemplo datur ut arma capiant.[4] Interim placet ex regiis auxiliis centum equites et parem numerum iaculatorum peditum exire. Perseus hora[5] ferme diei quarta, cum paulo plus mille passus abesset a castris Romanis, consistere signa peditum iussit; praegressus ipse cum equitibus ac levi armatura; et Cotys cum eo ducesque aliorum auxiliorum praecesserunt. Minus quingentos passus ab castris aberant, cum in conspectu fuere hostium equites; duae alae erant magna ex parte Gallorum—Cassignatus praerat—et levis armaturae centum fere et quinquaginta Mysi et Cretenses. Constitit rex, incertus quantae hostium copiae essent. Duas[6] inde ex agmine turmas Thracum, duas Macedonum cum binis Cretensium cohortibus et Thracum misit.

[1] ordirentur regiis Madvig: dirimentur regis V.
[2] creverant Crévier: creuerunt V.
[3] sentiebant Madvig: censebant V.
[4] capiant Fr.: placeat V.
[5] hora add. Sigonius: om. V.
[6] quantae hostium copiae essent. duas Novák: quanta esse duos esse duos V.

[1] If this number is right, a somewhat larger force was actually sent, cf. below § 7.

LVII. Then about the same time both the consul B.C. 171 and the king held a council to consider how to open the campaign. The spirits of the king's men had risen when the devastated area of Pheraean territory had been yielded to their side by the enemy; and so they advised going thence at once against the enemy's camp and giving him no further time for delay. The Romans also were aware that their delay was being roundly criticized among their allies, who were especially incensed that aid had not been given the Pheraeans. While they were conferring as to what to do—for Eumenes and Attalus were present in the council—an alarmed messenger reported that the enemy was at hand with a large column. The council was dismissed and the signal for arming immediately given. Meanwhile it was decided to send out from the king's auxiliary troops a hundred [1] cavalry and an equal number of javelin-throwers on foot. At about the fourth hour of the day Perseus ordered the ranks of the infantry to halt at a distance of a little over a mile from the Roman camp; he himself led the way with the cavalry and light-armed force; Cotys too and the leaders of the other auxiliaries went on with him. They were less than half a mile from the camp when enemy cavalry came in sight; there were two squadrons made up mostly of Gauls [2]—Cassignatus was the commander—and of light-armed troops about one hundred and fifty Mysians and Cretans. The king halted, not being sure how large the enemy forces were. Then he sent from the column two troops of Thracians and two of Macedonians with two cohorts each of Cretans and Thracians. Since they

[2] I.e. Galatians from Asia Minor.

A.U.C. 583

9 Proelium, cum[1] pares numero essent neque ab hac aut illa parte nova auxilia subvenirent, incerta victoria[2] finitum est. Eumenis ferme triginta interfecti, inter quos Cassignatus dux Gallorum cecidit. Et tunc quidem Perseus ad Sycurium 10 copias reduxit; postero die circa eandem horam in eundem locum rex copias admovit plaustris cum aqua sequentibus; nam duodecim milium passuum via[3] omnis sine aqua et plurimi pulveris erat; affectosque siti, si primo in conspectu dimicassent, 11 pugnaturos fuisse apparebat. Cum Romani quiessent, stationibus etiam intra vallum reductis, regii quoque in castra redeunt. Hoc per aliquot dies fecerunt, sperantes fore ut Romani equites abeuntium novissimum agmen aggrederentur; inde certa- 12 mine orto, cum[4] longius a castris eos elicuissent, facile, ubiubi essent, se, qui equitatu et levi armatura plus possent, conversuros aciem.

LVIII. Postquam inceptum non succedebat, castra propius hostem movit rex et a quinque milibus 2 passuum communivit.[5] Inde luce prima in eodem quo solebat loco peditum acie instructa, equitatum omem levemque armaturam ad castra hostium ducit. 3 Visus et plurium[6] et propior solito pulvis trepidationem in castris Romanis fecit. Et primo vix creditum nuntianti[7] est, quia prioribus continuis diebus numquam ante horam quartam hostis apparu- 4 erat; tum solis ortus erat. Deinde ut plurium clamore et cursu a portis dubitatio exempta est,

[1] proelium, cum Grynaeus: proelium esset cum V.
[2] incerta victoria Grynaeus: incertam victoriam V.
[3] via add. Fr.: om. V. [4] cum add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] passuum communivit Novák: passum communi V.
[6] plurium Fr.: plurimum V.
[7] nuntianti Fr.: nuntiatum V.

were equally matched as to numbers and from B.C. 171
neither the one side nor the other were reinforcements sent up, the battle ended in a draw. Of Eumenes' men about thirty were killed, among whom Cassignatus, leader of the Gauls, fell. And for the time being Perseus led back his forces to Sycurium; on the next day at about the same hour to the same place the king brought up his troops, followed by wagons with water; for the journey of twelve miles was all waterless and exceedingly dusty; it was clear that they would have fought under the handicap of thirst if the battle had begun at the first sight of the foe. When the Romans kept quiet, even withdrawing their outposts within the rampart, the king's men also returned to camp. This they did during several days, hoping that the Roman cavalry would attack the rear of their departing column; then after a fight had begun, when they had lured them too far from camp, they could easily, wheresoever they might be, turn the tide of battle by their superior power in cavalry and light troops.

LVIII. After the attempt failed of success, the king moved his camp nearer the enemy and fortified it at five miles' distance. From there at dawn he drew up his battle-line of infantry in the usual place and led all his cavalry and light troops to the camp of the enemy. The sight of dust nearer to them and from a larger force than usual caused alarm in the Roman camp. At first they hardly believed their sentry's report, because regularly on previous days the enemy had never appeared before the fourth hour; this time it was at sunrise. Then as doubt vanished at the shouting and dashing tumultus ingens oboritur. Tribuni praefectique et centuriones in praetorium, miles ad sua quisque

A.U.C. 583

5 tentoria discurrit. Minus quingentos passus a vallo instruxerat Perseus suos circa tumulum quem
6 Callinicum [1] vocant. Laevo cornu Cotys rex praeerat cum omnibus suae gentis; equitum ordines levis armatura interposita distinguebat. In dextro cornu Macedones erant equites, intermixti turmis
7 eorum Cretenses; huic armaturae Midon Beroeaeus, equitibus et summae partis eius Meno Antigonensis
8 praeerat. Proximi cornibus [2] constiterant regii equites, et mixtum genus, delecta plurium gentium auxilia; Patrocles Antigonensis his et Paeoniae
9 praefectus Didas erant praepositi. Medius omnium rex erat; circa eum agema quod vocant, equitumque
10 sacrae [3] alae. Ante se statuit funditores iaculatoresque: [4] quadringentorum manus utraque numerum explebat; Ionem [5] Thessalonicensem et Artemona Dolopem [6] iis praefecit. Sic regii constiterant.
11 Consul intra vallum peditum acie instructa et ipse equitatum omnem cum levi armatura emisit;
12 pro vallo instructi sunt. Dextro cornu praepositus C. Licinius Crassus, consulis frater, cum omni

[1] Callinicum Madvig: callicinum V.
[2] cornibus Fr.: cornicibus V.
[3] equitumque sacrae Fr.: equitum sacraeque V.
[4] iaculatores Fr.: iaculatoresque equitumquae equitum V.
[5] Ionem Fr.: rationem V.
[6] Artemona Dolopem Madvig: certimanoptolopemum V.

---

[1] I.e. of Glorious Victory.

[2] This name (cf. below lxvi. 5, XLIV. xlii. 2) is not used by other extant writers; it might mean the "royal squadron" of Cavalry Companions (Arrian, Anabasis, III. 11. 8). which was also called agema ("Guard"), cf. Antiochus' Horse-Guard, back from the gates of a larger number of men, a great confusion arose. The tribunes, prefects and centurions rushed to headquarters, the rank-and-file each to his own tent. Less than half a mile from the rampart Perseus drew up his men about the hill which they call Callinicus.[1] King Cotys was in charge of the left wing with all his tribesmen; light-armed troops, placed between, divided the units of cavalry. On the right wing were Macedonian cavalry, and Cretans interspersed among their troops; Midon of Beroea was in charge of the latter force, Menon of Antigonea commanded the cavalry and the formation as a whole. Next to the wings were posted the royal cavalry and mixed units of the picked auxiliaries of many nations; Patrocles of Antigonea and Didas the governor of Paeonia were in command of these. The king was in the centre of the whole line; around him was what they call the Guard, and the sacred squadrons[2] of the cavalry. Before him he placed the slingers and javelin-throwers; each band attained to the number of four hundred; Ion of Thessalonica and Artemon, a Dolopian, he put in command of these. Thus the king's men were arrayed. After the Roman infantry had been drawn up within the rampart, the consul likewise sent out all his cavalry with the light troops; they were arrayed before the rampart. On the right wing the commander was Gaius Licinius Crassus, the brother of the consul, with all the Italian cavalry, B.C. 171

XXXVII. xl. 6 and 11, especially if the agema here mentioned was the Foot-Guard of peltasts (above li. 4, and the note). Sage's note on Antiochus' Guard (loc. cit.) suggests that sacrae alae defines agema here. The name "sacred" may have been used on analogy with the Sacred Band of Thebes under Pelopidas, cf. Plutarch, Pelopidas, xviii.

A.U.C. 583

Italico equitatu, velitibus[1] intermixtis; sinistro M. Valerius Laevinus sociorum ex Graecis populis equites habebat et[2] eiusdem gentis levem armaturam;
13 mediam autem aciem cum delectis equitibus extraordinariis tenebat Q. Mucius. Ducenti equites Galli ante signa horum instructi et de auxiliis 14 Eumenis Cyrtiorum gentis trecenti. Thessali quadringenti equites parvo intervallo super laevum cornu locati. Eumenes rex Attalusque cum omni manu sua ab tergo inter postremam aciem ac vallum steterunt.

LIX. In hunc modum maxime instructae acies, par ferme utrimque numeris equitum ac levis armaturae, concurrunt, a funditoribus iaculatori-
2 busque qui praecesserant[3] proelio orto. Primi omnium Thraces, haud secus quam[4] diu claustris retentae ferae, ita concitati cum ingenti clamore in dextrum cornu, Italicos equites, incurrerunt ut[5]
3 usu belli et ingenio impavida gens turbaretur . . . . hastas petere pedites . . . . nunc succidere crura

[1] velitibus Fr.: ut uelitis V.
[2] et add. Drakenborch: om. V.
[3] praecesserant Madvig: praecesserunt V.
[4] haud secus quam Fr.: ut secus quidem V.
[5] ut Fr.: et V.

[1] These were not unlike the Greek peltasts, but used more as mere skirmishers, cf. XXVI. iv (this represents the first time they were used for an important service), XXX. xxxiii. 3, XXXI. xxxv. 5. The velites disappear from the Roman army not long after this time, as foreign auxiliaries replace them. For their arms, cf. Polybius VI. 22.

and the light infantry of the legions[1] intermingled; B.C 171 on the left Marcus Valerius Laevinus had the allied cavalry from the peoples of Greece and the light troops of the same nation; the centre, however, Quintus Mucius held with the picked Élite Cavalry.[2] Before the standards of the centre were arrayed two hundred Gallic cavalry and three hundred of Eumenes' Cyrtian[3] auxiliaries. Four hundred Thessalian cavalry were placed at a short distance beyond the left wing. King Eumenes and Attalus with all their forces were posted behind, between the rear line and the rampart.

LIX. Drawn up in very nearly this fashion and with numbers of cavalry and light troops about even on both sides, the lines clashed, the battle beginning with the slingers and javelin-throwers, who were in advance. First of all the Thracians, like beasts of prey long held behind bars, charged so vigorously with a great shout upon the Roman right wing, the Italian cavalry, that this people, courageous by nature and through experience in war,[4] was thrown into confusion . . . spears to attack the infantry . . .[5] now to

[2] These were selected from the rest of the cavalry as the fittest, cf. Polybius, VI. 26. 6.

[3] Nomad brigands from the Kurd country in northwest Persia, cf. XXXVII. xl. 9.

[4] Apparently exceptions to the rule of inexperience, above lv. 3.

[5] The words introducing the account of the melée have entirely disappeared; the sense and construction of the three isolated words is not clear; some scholars restore two more words, "phalanx," and rumpiis (long Thracian spears, cf. XXXI. xxxix. 11) which do not seem to fit the context. (So E. S., cf. critical note 1 on p. 474; but the spears might have been used "to pierce their loins," cf. the alternative text in the note.)

A.U.C. 583

4 equis, nunc ilia suffodere.[1] Perseus, in mediam invectus aciem, Graecos primo impetu avertit; quibus fusis cum gravis ab tergo instaret hostis, Thessalorum equitatus, qui a laevo[2] cornu brevi spatio diiunctus in subsidiis fuerat extra concursum, primo spectator certaminis, deinde inclinata re 5 maximo usui[3] fuit. Cedentes enim sensim integris ordinibus, postquam se Eumenis auxiliis adiunxerunt, et cum eo tutum inter ordines suos receptum sociis fuga dissipatis dabant et, cum minus conferti hostes instarent, progredi etiam ausi multos fugientium 6 obvios exceperunt. Nec regii, sparsi iam ipsi passim sequendo, cum ordinatis et certo incedentibus[4] 7 gradu manus conserere audebant. Cum victor equestri proelio rex parvo momento si adiuvisset debellatum esse clamaret,[5] et opportune adhortanti supervenit phalanx quam sua sponte, ne audaci coepto deessent, Hippias et Leonnatus raptim adduxerant, postquam prospere pugnasse equitem 8 acceperunt. Fluctuante rege[6] inter spem metumque[7] tantae rei conandae Cretensis Euander,

[1] sic fere edd. Legimus in v turbareturtr ec [su]b [pal]a [n] gishastaspeterepedites . . . [equor]umque i (sic) nuncsucciderecrurarumpisnunciliasuffodere (litterae inclusae incertae sunt). Mentionem phalangis factam esse licet suspicari, sed phalanx nondum proelio intererat (vid. sect. 7, infra). Vocabulum rumpiis latere Giarratano vidit, sed gladio non rumpia opus est ad equorum crura succidenda. Despero. (E. S.) At legere possumus : equorumque ii nunc succidere crura, rumpiis nunc illa suffodere. (E. H. Warmington.)

[2] qui a laeuo Fr. : qui a leo, ut vid. V.

[3] maximo usui Fr. : maxum usui V.

[4] incedentibus Fr. : indendentibus V.

[5] clamaret add. Madvig : om. V.

cut off the horses' legs, now to pierce their loins. B.C. 171
Perseus, charging the centre of the line, thrust back the Greeks with his first attack;[1] in the rout of these when the enemy pressed heavily from the rear, the Thessalian cavalry, which had been in support, away a short distance from the left wing and beyond the melée, though at first spectators of the conflict, were later, when the decision had been reached, of the greatest use. For, retreating gradually with formation intact, after they had joined the auxiliaries of Eumenes, with him they both provided a safe retreat between their units for their allies scattered in flight, and when the enemy pressed on in less close order, they even risked advancing and met many of the fugitives half-way. Nor did the king's men, now themselves scattered in a general pursuit, dare to close in battle with an enemy in formation and advancing steadily. While the king, victorious in the cavalry battle, was crying out that if he had helped with a slight impulse a decisive victory would have been won, the phalanx also arrived appropriately at the very moment of his urging; Hippias and Leonnatus had brought the phalanx up swiftly on their own initiative, in order not to fail the bold beginning, after they had received the report that the cavalry had won their battle. While the king was wavering between hope and fear of attempting so great a feat, the Cretan Evander, whom the

[1] Livy fails to mention the Roman Élite Cavalry, either out of confusion, or because weakness in the Aetolian contingent at this point was regarded as the cause of the whole Roman debacle, cf. below lx. 9.

[6] fluctuante rege Fr.: fluctuanti regi V.
[7] metumque Fr.: metumque ac V.

A.U.C. 583

quo ministro Delphis ad insidias Eumenis regis usus[1] erat, postquam agmen peditum[2] venientium 9 sub signis vidit, ad regem accurrit et monere institit ne elatus felicitate summam rerum temere in non 10 necessariam aleam daret; si contentus bene re gesta quiesset eo die, vel pacis honestae condicionem habiturum vel plurimos belli socios qui fortunam sequerentur si bellare mallet. In hoc consilium
11 pronior erat animus regis. Itaque collaudato Euandro signa referri peditumque agmen redire in castra iubet, equitibus receptui canere.[3]

LX. Cecidere eo die ab Romanis ducenti equites, duo milia haud minus peditum; capti sescenti ferme.[4] Ex regiis autem viginti equites, quadra-
2 ginta pedites interfecti. Postquam rediere in castra victores, omnes quidem laeti, ante alios Thracum insolens laetitia eminebat;[5] cum cantu enim superfixa hastis[6] capita hostium portantes redierunt.
3 Apud Romanos non maestitia tantum ex male gesta re, sed pavor etiam erat ne extemplo castra hostis aggrederetur. Eumenes consuli[7] suadere, ut trans Peneum transferret castra, ut pro munimento amnem[8] haberet, dum perculsi milites animos colligerent. Consul moveri flagitio timoris fatendi;

[1] usus Fr.: usus usus V.
[2] peditum Perizonius: impeditum V.
[3] canere Fr.: caneretre V.
[4] capti sescenti ferme Madvig: captiac.fermecc.equites. (sic) V.
[5] eminebat Fr.: minabat V.
[6] hastis add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[7] consuli add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[8] amnem Fr.: manem V.

[1] Cf. above xv. 3 ff.

king had used as his tool at Delphi in the ambushing B.C. 171 of Eumenes,[1] on seeing the column of infantry with their standards advancing, ran to the king and pressed the warning that he should not be so puffed up by good fortune as to stake his whole enterprise rashly on a needless throw of the dice; if, satisfied with his success, he should rest for that day, either he would have a basis for an honourable peace or an abundance of such allies in war as would follow the lead of fortune, in case he should prefer to fight. To this advice the mind of the king was more inclined. And so, praising Evander, he ordered a withdrawal, and that the column of infantry should return to camp, while for the cavalry the signal for returning should be sounded.

LX. That day there fell on the Roman side two hundred cavalry, and hardly less than two thousand infantry; about six hundred were captured.[2] Of the king's men, however, twenty cavalrymen and forty infantrymen were killed. After the victors returned to camp, all indeed rejoiced, but above the others the swaggering joy of the Thracians was conspicuous; for they returned bearing with songs the heads of their enemies impaled on spears. On the Roman side there was not only gloom because of their lack of success, but also fear that the enemy might immediately attack the camp. Eumenes advised the consul to move his camp across the Peneüs, so that he might have the river as a fortification while the soldiers were recovering their shattered morale. The consul was affected by the disgrace

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius Paullus ix. 2, gives the loss in dead as 2500; in Sayings of Romans 197 F (L.C.L., Moralia III., p. 173) the total dead and captured are given as 2800, as here.

U.C. 583

4 victus tamen ratione, silentio noctis transductis
5 copiis, castra in ulteriore ripa communivit.[1] Rex[2] postero die ad lacessendos proelio hostes progressus, postquam trans amnem in tuto posita castra animadvertit, fatebatur quidem peccatum quod pridie non institisset victis, sed aliquanto maiorem culpam 6 esse quod nocte foret cessatum; nam, ut neminem alium suorum moveret, levi armatura immissa trepidantium in transitu fluminis hostium deleri 7 magna ex parte copias potuisse. Romanis quidem praesens pavor[3] demptus erat, in tuto castra habenti-bus; damnum inter cetera praecipue famae movebat.
8 Et in consilio apud consulem pro se quisque in Aetolos conferebant causam: ab iis[4] fugae terroris-9 que principium ortum; secutos pavorem Aetolorum et ceteros socios Graecorum populorum. Quinque principes Aetolorum, qui primi terga vertentes 10 conspecti dicebantur, Romam missi.[5] Thessali pro contione laudati, ducesque eorum etiam virtutis causa donati.

LXI. Ad regem spolia caesorum hostium refere-2 bantur. Ex[6] his aliis arma insignia, aliis[7] equos, quibusdam captivos dono dabat. Scuta erant supra mille quingenta;[8] loricae thoracesque mille amplius

[1] communivit Madvig: communivi V.
[2] rex Fr.: rexex V.
[3] pavor Fr.: fauor V.
[4] causam ab iis Fr.: causa ab is V.
[5] Romam missi add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[6] ex Drakenborch: done ex V.
[7] insignia aliis Fr.: in sicilia aliquis V.
[8] quingenta Fr.: a (sic) V. ut et alibi.

[1] Polybius, XXVII. 15. 14, regarded the charge against the Aetolians as a piece of party politics originated by their countryman, the general Lyciscus, and foolishly believed by of admitting timidity; but being overcome by reason, B.C. 171

he led his troops across in the dead of night and fortified a camp on the farther bank. The king came up next day to harass the enemy with battle, and, after finding out that the camp had been placed in safety across the river, admitted that he had indeed been at fault in not having pressed home the previous day his attack against the conquered, but that a somewhat greater mistake was that he had been inactive during the night; for even if he had not stirred one other man of his forces, he could, by an attack of the light troops, have to a great extent destroyed the enemy's troops while they were in confusion as they crossed the river. For the Romans indeed the immediate fear was removed, since they had a camp safely placed; but the loss, among other things, of reputation particularly disturbed them. And in the conference before the consul each in his own defence assigned the blame to the Aetolians; the beginning, they said, of the flight and panic had been made by them; the other allies from the peoples of Greece had also followed the rout of the Aetolians. Five chiefs of the Aetolians, who were the first said to have been seen turning their backs, were sent to Rome.[1] The Thessalians were praised before an assembly, and their leaders were even awarded presents for valour.

LXI. To the king were brought the spoils of the slain enemy. Of these he gave as gifts, to some the noteworthy arms, to others horses, and to some few prisoners. There were over fifteen hundred shields; coats of mail and breastplates made up a total of the Romans. Cf. Appian, Macedonian Wars, IX. xii: Αἰτωλῶν δὲ καὶ ἑτέρων Ἑλλήνων κατεψεύσατο ὡς πρῶτω τραπέντων.

A.U.C. 583

summam explebant; galearum gladiorumque et missilium omnis generis maior aliquanto numerus. Haec per se ampla laetaque [1] multiplicata verbis regis, quae ad contionem vocato exercitu habuit. " Praeiudicatum eventum belli habetis. Meliorem partem hostium, equitatum Romanum, quo invictos se esse gloriabantur,[2] fudistis. Equites enim illis principes iuventutis, equites seminarium [3] senatus; inde lectos in patres [4] consules, inde imperatores creant: horum spolia paulo ante divisimus inter vos. Nec minorem de legionibus peditum victoriam habetis, quae nocturna fuga vobis subtractae naufragorum trepidatione passim natantium flumen compleverunt. Sed facilius nobis sequentibus victos Peneum superare erit quam illis trepidantibus fuit; transgressique extemplo castra [5] oppugnabimus quae hodie cepissemus ni fugissent; aut si acie decernere volent, eundem pugnae pedestris eventum expectate, qui equitum in certamine fuit." [6]

Et qui vicerant alacres, spolia caesorum hostium umeris gerentes, decora [7] sua audivere, ex eo quod [8] acciderat spem futuri praecipientes,[9] et pedites aliena

[1] ampla laetaque Weissenborn: ampletaquae V.
[2] gloriabantur Fr.: locriabantur V.
[3] seminarium Fr.: feminarium V.
[4] in patres Madvig: inpatrum V.
[5] transgressique extemplo castra Fr.: etransgressi qua exemplo castram (sic) V.
[6] fuit Ruperti: fuerit V.
[7] decora J. F. Gronovius: da.ora (sic) V.
[8] ex eo quod Fr.: et ex quo eo V.
[9] praecipientes Fr.: praeponentes V.

[1] Cf. II. xx. 10–11, IX. xiv. 14–16, X. xxviii. 7, and Polybius VI. 20. 9; but not all the cavalry were young men of high rank, cf. XXX. xviii. 15, where the equites illustres are speci-over a thousand; of helmets, swords and missiles B.C. 171 of all sorts the number was somewhat greater. These gifts, splendid and agreeable in themselves, were augmented by the words of the king, which he pronounced before the army summoned to assembly.

"You have advance notice of the outcome of the war! You have routed the better part of the enemy, the Roman cavalry, in which they used to boast that they were unconquered. For among the Romans the cavalrymen are the leading young men,[1] the cavalry is the training-school for the senate; from it their consuls are chosen to be among the Fathers; from it they select their generals: it is the spoils of these men which we have recently divided among you. And no less a victory have you over the legions of the infantry, which, escaping from you by a night retreat, filled the river everywhere with the panic of shipwrecked swimmers. But it will be easier for us as we pursue the conquered to pass over the Peneüs than it was for them in their panic; once we have crossed, we shall immediately attack their camp, which we would have captured to-day if they had not fled; or if they wish to decide the issue by battle in the open, look for the same outcome of the infantry fight as took place in the clash of the cavalry."

Both those who had conquered, wearing on their shoulders the spoils of the slain enemy, eagerly heard their own praises, anticipating a happy outcome in the future because of what had happened, ally mentioned, and XXXIX. xxxi. 16; the transition from a cavalry composed of noble citizens to one composed of foreign auxiliaries was at this time under way.

A.U.C. 583 gloria accensi, praecipue qui Macedonum phalangis erant, sibi quoque et navandae regi operae et similem gloriam ex hoste pariendi occasionem optabant. 11 Contione[1] dimissa, postero die profectus inde ad Mopselum posuit castra. Tumulus hic ante Tempe eminet et Larisa medius abest Gonnum eunti.[2]

LXII. Romani[3] non abscedentes ab ripa Penei 2 transtulerunt in locum tutiorem castra. Eo Misagenes Numida venit cum mille equitibus, pari peditum numero, ad hoc elephantis duobus et 3 viginti. Per eos dies consilium habenti regi de summa rerum[4] cum iam consedisset ferocia ab re bene gesta, ausi sunt quidam amicorum consilium dare ut secunda fortuna in condicionem honestae pacis uteretur potius quam spe vana evectus in 4 casum irevocabilem se daret. Modum imponere secundis rebus nec nimis credere serenitati praesentis[5] fortunae, prudentis[6] hominis et merito felicis esse. 5 Mitteret[7] ad consulem qui foedus in easdem leges renovarent, quibus Philippus pater[8] eius pacem 6 ab[9] T. Quinctio victore accepisset. Neque finiri[10] bellum magnificentius quam ab tam[11] memorabili pugna posse,[12] neque[13] spem firmiorem pacis perpetuae dari quam quae perculsos adverso proelio Romanos 7 molliores factura sit ad paciscendum. Quodsi Ro-

[1] optabant. contione add. Fr. : om. V.
[2] hic . . . eunti Madvig : hycante tempeste est eminet larisa medius abest onum V.
[3] Romani add. Fr. : om. V. [4] rerum add. Crévier : om. V.
[5] serenitati praesentis Fr. : serenitate praesenti V.
[6] prudentis Fr. : praesentis V.
[7] esse. mitteret Fr. : essetmittere V.
[8] pater Fr. : frater V.
[9] ab Kreyssig : b(sic) V. [10] finiri Fr. : sinere V.
[11] ab tam Kreyssig : apta V.
[12] posse add. Crévier : om. V. [13] neque add. Fr. : om. V.

and also the infantry, fired by the glory which others had won, especially those of the Macedonian phalanx, hoped for themselves also an opportunity both of achieving some service for the king and of winning a like glory from the enemy. The assembly was dismissed. Next day the king set out from there and pitched camp at Mopselus. This is a hill looming up before Tempê and halfway as one goes from Larisa to Gonnus. B.C. 171

LXII. The Romans, not departing from the bank of the Peneüs, transferred their camp to a safer place. There Misagenes the Numidian arrived with a thousand cavalry, an equal number of infantry, and in addition twenty-two elephants. As during these days the king was holding a council concerning his general policy, now that his overboldness resulting from success had subsided, some of his friends took courage to advise him to use his good fortune as a basis for an honourable peace rather than, led astray by idle hope, to throw himself into irrevocable disaster. To impose restraint on success and not to trust too much to the calm of his present fortune, they said, was the way of a wise man and one who was deservedly fortunate. Let him send to the consul men to renew the treaty on the same terms as those on which his father Philip had received peace from the victorious Titus Quinctius.[1] The war could not be ended more gloriously than with so memorable a fight, nor could a more well-founded hope of lasting peace present itself than that which would make the Romans, shaken by the loss of a battle, more moderate in framing the treaty. But

[1] Cf. XXXIII. xxx; on Perseus' policy, cf. Polybius XXVII. 8.

A.U.C. 583

mani tum quoque insita pertinacia aequa aspernarentur, deos hominesque et moderationis Persei et 8 illorum pervicacis superbiae futuros testes. Numquam ab talibus consiliis abhorrebat regis animus.
9 Itaque ut[1] plurium assensu comprobata est sententia, legati ad consulem missi; adhibito frequenti consilio[2]
10 auditi sunt. Pacem petiere,[3] vectigal quantum Philippus pactus esset, daturum Persea Romanis pollicentes; urbibus agris locisque quibus Philippus cessisset cessurum quam[4] primum. Haec legati.
11 Summotis his cum consultarent, Romana constantia vicit in consilio. Ita tum mos erat in adversis rebus[5] voltum secundae fortunae gerere, moderari
12 animo in secundis. Responderi placuit ita pacem dari si de summa rerum liberum senatui permittat rex de se deque universa Macedonia statuendi ius.
13 Haec cum renuntiassent legati, miraculo ignaris Romani[6] moris pertinacia esse,[7] et plerique vetare amplius mentionem pacis facere; ultro mox quaesi-
14 turos quod oblatum fastidiant. Perseus hanc ipsam

[1] ut add. Novák : om. V.
[2] ad. fr. con. bis scripsit V.
[3] petiere Perizonius : petere V.
[4] cessurum quam Perizonius : caesarum V.
[5] adversis rebus Fuegner : aduersus V.
[6] Romani add. Madvig : om. V.
[7] esse Madvig : morisesse V.

---

[1] Strictly speaking, Philip had paid a war-indemnity, not a tribute.

[2] Examples of this Roman virtue may be found in XXII. lxi. 1 and 13, cf. ibid. xxxvii. 3.

[3] Cf. Polybius XXVII. 8. 7–10. "It was unanimously decided (by the Roman council) to give as severe a reply as possible, it being in all cases the traditional Roman custom if then too the innate stubbornness of the Roman B.C. 171 should scorn fair terms, gods and men would be witnesses both of Perseus' moderation and of his opponents' stiff-necked haughtiness. The king's mind was never averse to such counsels. And so as the opinion was approved by the assent of the majority, envoys were sent to the consul; they were heard in the presence of a full council. They asked for peace, promising that Perseus would pay the Romans as much tribute [1] as Philip had promised, and that he would yield with all speed the cities, land and places which Philip had yielded. So far the envoys. When after the withdrawal of the envoys the matter was discussed, Roman steadfastness [2] carried the day in the council. The custom of that age was to wear in misfortune the aspect of success and to be of temperate disposition in successes. It was decided to reply that peace would be granted on condition that the king should give to the senate the unconditional right of deciding on a general policy concerning the king himself and concerning all Macedonia.[3] When the envoys reported these terms, to those ignorant of the Roman character their obstinacy was portentous, and many advised against any further reference to peace; for soon, they said, the Romans would of their own accord seek what they scorned when offered. Perseus to show themselves most imperious and severe in the season of defeat, and most lenient after success. That this is noble conduct every one will confess, but perhaps it is open to doubt if it is possible under certain circumstances. In the present case, then, their answer was as follows. They ordered Perseus to submit absolutely, giving the senate authority to decide as they saw fit about the affairs of Macedonia" (tr. Paton, L.C.L.).

A.U.C. 583 superbiam—quippe ex fiducia virium esse—timere, et summam pecuniae augens, si pretio pacem emere posset, non destitit animum consulis temptare. Postquam nihil ex eo quod primo responderat mutabat, desperata pace ad Sycurium unde profectus erat redit, belli casum de integro temptaturus.

LXIII. Fama equestris pugnae vulgata per Graeciam nudavit voluntates hominum. Non enim solum qui partis Macedonum erant, sed plerique ingentibus Romanorum obligati beneficiis, quidam vim superbiamque experti Persei,[1] laeti eam famam accepere, non ob [2] aliam causam quam pravo studio, quo etiam in certaminibus ludicris volgus utitur, deteriori atque infirmiori favendo.

[1] Persei add. Weissenborn : om. V.
[2] ob Fr. : ab V.

[1] Polybius XXVII. 9 illustrates this sentiment with an anecdote of the Olympic Games: "The phenomenon was very like what happens in boxing contests at the games. For there, when a humble and much inferior combatant is matched against a celebrated and seemingly invincible athlete, the sympathy of the crowd is at once given to the inferior man. They cheer him on, and back him up enthusiastically; and if he manages to touch his opponent's face, and gets in a blow that leaves any mark, there is at once again the greatest excitement among them all. They sometimes even try to make fun of the other man, not out of any dislike for him or disapproval but from a curious sort of sympathy and a natural instinct to favour the weaker. If, however, one calls their attention at the right time to their error, they very soon change their minds and correct it. This was what Clitomachus did, as is told. He was considered to be a quite invincible boxer, and his fame had spread over the whole world, when Ptolemy, ambitious to destroy his reputation, trained with the greatest care and sent off the boxer Aristonicus, a man who seemed to have a remarkable natural gift eared this very haughtiness—thinking that it B.C. 171 sprang from confidence in their strength—and, increasing the sum of money, if perchance he might buy peace for a price, he did not cease to test the purpose of the consul. After the latter would make no change in the terms of his first answer, Perseus, giving up hope of peace, returned to Sycurium from whence he had set out, intending to try anew the fortunes of war.

LXIII. The report of the cavalry battle, as it spread abroad throughout Greece, laid bare the inclinations of the inhabitants. For not only partisans of Macedonia but many who were indebted to the Romans for huge benefits, and some few who had felt the violence and tyranny of Perseus, received this news gladly, for no other reason than the morbid eagerness which the mob feels in athletic contests also—the eagerness to cheer on the worse and weaker party.[1] for this sport. Upon this Aristonicus arriving in Greece and challenging Clitomachus at Olympia, the crowd, it seems, at once took the part of the former and cheered him on, delighted to see that some one, once in a way at least, ventured to pit himself against Clitomachus. And when, as the fight continued, he appeared to be his adversary's match, and once or twice landed a telling blow, there was great clapping of hands, and the crowd became delirious with excitement, cheering on Aristonicus. At this time they say that Clitomachus, after withdrawing for a few moments to recover his breath, turned to the crowd and asked them what they meant by cheering on Aristonicus and backing him up all they could. Did they think he himself was not fighting fairly, or were they not aware that Clitomachus was now fighting for the glory of Greece and Aristonicus for that of King Ptolemy? Would they prefer to see an Egyptian conquer the Greeks and win the Olympian crown, or to hear a Theban and Boeotian proclaimed by the herald as victor in

A.U.C. 583

3 Eodem tempore in Boeotia summa vi Haliartum[1] Lucretius praetor oppugnabat;[2] et quamquam nec habebant externa auxilia obsessi praeter Coronaeorum iuniores, qui prima obsidione moenia intraverant neque sperabant, tamen ipsi animis magis quam 4 viribus resistebant. Nam et eruptiones in opera crebro faciebant, et arietem admotum nunc saxis ingentibus, nunc[3] libramento plumbi gravatum ad terram urguebant et, si qua declinare nequiverant[4] ictum, pro diruto muro novum tumultuario opere, raptim ex ipsa ruinae strage congestis saxis, extrue- 5 bant. Cum operibus lentior oppugnatio[5] esset, scalas per manipulos dividi praetor iussit, ut corona undique moenia aggressurus, eo magis suffecturam ad id multitudinem ratus, quod, qua parte palus urbem cingit, nec attinebat oppugnari nec poterat. 6 Ipse ab ea parte, qua duae turres quodque[6] inter eas muri fuerat corruerat,[7] duo milia militum delectorum admovit, ut[8] eodem tempore, quo ipse transcendere ruinas conaretur, concursu adversus se oppidanorum facto, scalis vacua defensoribus moenia capi parte 7 aliqua possent. Haud segniter oppidani vim[9] eius

[1] Haliartum ed. Vascosana : aliarum V.
[2] oppugnabat Duker : oppugnarat V.
[3] saxis ingentibus nunc add. Kreyssig : om. V.
[4] declinare nequiverant Vahlen : declinarent quiaugu-ebant (sic) V.
[5] oppugnatio add. Vahlen : om. V.
[6] turres quodque Fr. : ut tresquoque V.
[7] corruerat add. Madvig : om. V.
[8] ut add. Fr. : om. V.
[9] vim Fr. : tum V.

---

the men's boxing-match? When Clitomachus had spoken thus, they say there was such a change in the sentiment of

At the same time in Boeotia Lucretius the praetor B.C. 171 was assaulting Haliartus with the utmost violence; and although the besieged had no reinforcements from outside except the younger men of Coronea, who had entered the walls at the beginning of the siege, and there was no hope of aid, yet they held out alone more by spirit than by strength. For they kept making frequent sallies against the siege-works and as the ram was brought up they pressed it to earth, weighing it down now with huge stones,[1] now with a mass of lead, and if they were at any point unable to turn aside the stroke, they built, in place of the destroyed wall, a new one of slapdash construction by hastily assembling stones from the very debris of the collapse. Since assault by siege-works was too slow, the praetor ordered ladders distributed among the maniples, intending to attack the wall everywhere, as it were in a ring, with the thought that his numbers would suffice the more surely for this purpose because, on the side where the swamp [2] girds the city, attack was neither important nor possible. On the side where two towers and the section of wall which had been between them had collapsed, he himself brought up two thousand picked troops so that at the same moment that he tried to scale the wreckage, as a rally of the townspeople took place to oppose him, the walls stripped of defenders might at some point or other be captured by the ladders. With no slackness the townsfolk the crowd that now all was reversed, and Aristonicus was beaten rather by the crowd than by Clitomachus " (tr. Paton, L.C.L.).

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. v. 4.

[2] The margin of Lake Copaïs.

A.U.C. 583

arcere parant. Nam super stratum ruinis locum fascibus aridis sarmentorum iniectis stantes cum ardentibus facibus accensuros eam se saepem[1] minabantur, ut, incendio intersaepti ab hoste, spatium ad obiciendum interiorem murum haberent. 8 Quod inceptum eorum fors impedit; nam tantus repente effusus[2] est imber ut nec accendi facile 9 pateretur et extingueret accensa. Itaque et transitus per distracta fumantia virgulta patuit, et in unius loci praesidium omnibus versis[3] moenia quoque pluribus simul partibus scalis capiuntur. 10 In primo tumultu captae urbis seniores impubesque quos casus obvios obtulit passim caesi; armati in arcem confugerunt; et postero die, cum spei nihil superesset, deditione facta sub corona venierunt. 11 Fuerunt autem duo milia ferme et quingenti.[4] Ornamenta urbis, statuae et tabulae[5] pictae, et quidquid pretiosae praedae fuit, ad naves delatum; 12 urbs diruta a fundamentis. Inde Thebas[6] ductus exercitus; quibus sine certamine receptis urbem tradidit exulibus et qui Romanorum partis erant; adversae factionis hominum fautorumque regis ac Macedonum familias sub corona vendidit. His gestis in Boeotia ad mare ac naves redit.

LXIV. Cum haec in Boeotia gererentur, Perseus

[1] saepem Madvig: saepe V.
[2] effusus Fr.: est infusus V.
[3] versis Fr.: uerbis V.
[4] quingenti Fr.: a. (sic) V.
[5] et tabulae Fr.: tabulae et V.
[6] inde Thebas Fr.: intebanos V.

[1] Strabo IX. 2. 30 notes: "Haliartus no longer exists, having been destroyed in the war with Perseus, and the Athenians have the territory as a gift of the Romans." This is probably incorrect, as an inscription has been found indicatprepared to ward off his assault. For on the area B.C. 171 strewn with wreckage they tossed dry bundles of brush and standing by with blazing torches threatened that they would fire this barrier, so that, barred off from the enemy by the blaze, they might have time to put an inner wall in the way. This preparation of theirs was hindered by chance; for such a rain suddenly poured down that it made the firing of the brush difficult and put out what had been fired. And so a passage lay open through the smoking twigs which were dragged aside and with all the citizens intent on the defense of one spot the walls too were taken by ladders in several places at once. In the first confusion of the city's capture the elders and the beardless whom chance brought in the way were cut down everywhere; the men-at-arms fled to the citadel; and the next day, when no ray of hope remained, on surrendering they were sold at auction. These were, moreover, about twenty-five hundred. The adornments of the city, statues and paintings and whatever costly booty there was, were taken to the fleet; the city was razed to the ground.[1] Thence the army was led to Thebes; this the praetor took over without struggle and put in the hands of the exiles and the party which favoured Rome; the estates[2] of the men of the opposing faction and of the supporters of the king and the Macedonians he sold at auction. After these achievements in Boeotia Lucretius returned to the sea and the fleet.

LXIV. While these things in Boeotia were being ing the existence of a community here subject to Athens. Pausanias (IX. 32. 5 ff.) found the site inhabited.

[2] Perhaps including the members of the families.

A.U.C. 583

2 ad Sycurium [1] stativa dierum aliquot habuit. Ubi cum audisset raptim Romanos circa ex agris demessum frumentum convehere, deinde ante sua quemque 3 tentoria spicas falcibus [2] desecantem, quo purius frumentum tereret, ingentes acervos per tota castra stramentorum [3] fecisse, ratus incendio opportuna esse, faces taedamque [4] et malleolos stuppae illitos pice parari iubet; atque ita media nocte profectus 4 ut prima luce aggressus falleret. Nequiquam primae stationes oppressae: tumultu ac terrore suo ceteros excitaverunt, signumque datum est arma extemplo capiendi; simulque in vallo, ad portas miles in- 5 structus erat. Tum vero pudore coeptae temere et inconsulte oppugnationis [5] castrorum Perseus extemplo [6] circumegit aciem et prima impedimenta ire, deinde peditum signa ferri iussit; ipse cum equitatu et levi armatura substitit ad agmen cogendum, ratus id quod accidit insecuturos ad extrema 6 ab tergo carpenda hostis. Breve certamen levis armaturae maxime cum procursatoribus fuit; equites peditesque sine tumultu in castra redierunt.

7 Demessis circa segetibus Romani ad Crannona, intactum agrum, castra movent. Ibi cum [7] securi et propter longinquitatem [8] et viae inopis aquarum difficultatem quae inter Sycurium et Crannona est, 8 stativa haberent, repente prima luce in [9] imminenti-

[1] ad Sycurium Fr.: assyrium V.
[2] falcibus J. F. Gronovius: fasicibus (sic) V.
[3] castra stramentorum Fr.: castramentorum V.
[4] faces taedamque Fr.: fastaedamque V.
[5] tum . . . oppugnationis Heraeus: et inconste oppugnationis V.
[6] extemplo Madvig: et extemplo V.
[7] movent. ibi cum Fr.: mouentibus ibi cum ibi cum V.
[8] longinquitatem Vahlen: cum longintate V.
[9] in add. Fr.: om. V.

accomplished, Perseus remained a few days in camp B.C. 171 at Sycurium. When he heard there that the Romans were hastily bringing in reaped grain from the fields round about, and then, each before his own tent, was clipping the ears with his sickle, so that the grain might be threshed out more cleanly, and that they had made great piles of straw throughout the whole camp, the king thought that this was a time suitable for a conflagration, and ordered torches and pitch-pine and fire-spears of tow smeared with pitch[1] to be prepared, and with this equipment set out at midnight, so as to make a surprise attack at dawn. Vainly the first outposts were overwhelmed; by their uproar and panic they roused the rest, and the signal was given to take arms at once; at the same time the soldiery was posted on the rampart and at the gates. Then indeed, in shame at the rash and foolish beginning of an attack on the camp, Perseus at once wheeled his line around and ordered the baggage to go first, then the infantry to move out; he himself with the cavalry and light troops halted to form the rear-guard, thinking that the enemy would, as actually happened, pursue to harass the last units from behind. There was a short struggle particularly of the light troops against skirmishers; the cavalry and infantry returned without disturbance to camp.

After reaping the crops round about, the Romans moved their camp to Crannon, an untouched territory. There while they were remaining in camp with a feeling of safety, both because of the distance and the difficulty of the almost waterless road between Sycurium and Crannon, suddenly at dawn on com-

[1] Cf. XXI. viii. 10; XXXVIII. vi. 2.

A.U.C. 583

bus tumulis equitatus regius cum levi armatura visus ingentem tumultum fecit. Pridie per meridiem profecti ab Sycurio erant; peditum agmen sub 9 lucem reliquerant[1] in proxima planitie. Stetit paulisper Perseus[2] in tumulis, elici posse ratus ad equestre[3] certamen Romanos; qui[4] postquam nihil movebant, equitem mittit qui pedites referre ad Sycurium signa iuberet; ipse mox insecutus.[5]
10 Romani equites modico intervallo sequentes, sicubi sparsos ac dissipatos invadere possent, postquam confertos abire signa atque ordines servantes viderunt, et ipsi in castra redeunt.

LXV. Inde offensus longinquitate itineris[6] rex ad Mopselum castra movit; et Romani demessis Crannonis segetibus in Phalannaeum agrum trans-
2 eunt. Ibi cum ex transfuga cognosset rex sine ullo armato praesidio passim vagantis per agros Romanos metere, cum mille[7] equitibus, duobus milibus Thracum et Cretensium profectus, cum quantum accelerare poterat effuso agmine isset, improviso
3 aggressus est Romanos. Iuncta vehicula, pleraque onusta,[8] mille admodum capiuntur, sescenti[9] ferme
4 homines. Praedam custodiendam ducendamque in 5 castra trecentis Cretensium dedit; ipse revocato ab effusa caede equite et reliquis peditum ducit ad proximum praesidium, ratus haud magno certa-
6 mine opprimi posse. L. Pompeius tribunus militum

[1] lucem reliquerant Fr.: luce reliquerat V.
[2] Perseus add. Held.: om. V.
[3] equestre Fr.: equites V.
[4] qui Fr.: quattuor V.
[5] insecutus Fr.: insecuti V.
[6] itineris Fr.: itineri V.
[7] mille add. Fr.: om. V.
[8] onusta Fr.: honesta V.
[9] sescenti Fr.: ac. V.

manding hills the king's cavalry with the light troops B.C. 171 was sighted and caused a great uproar. They had set out from Sycurium during the middle of the previous day; just before dawn they had left the column of infantry in the nearest plain. Perseus halted a while on the hills, thinking that possibly the Romans might be enticed to a cavalry struggle; after they would not budge, he sent a horseman to order the infantry to return to Sycurium; he presently followed. The Roman cavalry followed at a moderate distance, so that they might at any point be able to attack scattered or straggling men, but after they saw that the enemy was retreating in a body, keeping to his formations and ranks, they also returned to camp.

LXV. From Sycurium the king, disliking the length of the journey, moved his camp to Mopselus; and the Romans, having reaped the harvests of Crannon, moved to the fields of Phalanna. When the king learned from a deserter that there the Romans were reaping, wandering everywhere through the fields with no armed guard, he set out with a thousand cavalry, and two thousand of the Thracians and Cretans, and since he marched with as great speed as he could attain, in a scattered column, he fell without warning upon the Romans. Wagons with their teams, many of them loaded, were captured to the number of quite a thousand, and about six hundred men. He gave the booty to three hundred Cretans to guard and bring to camp; he himself, recalling from the slaughter far and wide the cavalry and the rest of the infantry led them against the nearest guard detachment, thinking that with no great struggle it could be crushed. Lucius Pompeius, praeerat, qui perculsos milites repentino hostium adventu in propinquum tumulum recepit, loci se praesidio quia numero et viribus impar erat [1] de-7 fensurus. Ibi cum in orbem milites coegisset, ut densatis scutis ab ictu [2] sagittarum et iaculorum sese tuerentur, Perseus circumdato armatis tumulo alios ascensum undique temptare iubet et comminus proelium conserere, alios eminus [3] tela in-

A.U.C. 583

8 gerere. Ingens [4] Romanos terror circumstabat; nam neque conferti propellere [5] eos qui in tumulum conitebantur [6] poterant et, ubi ordines procursando
9 solvissent, patebant [7] iaculis sagittisque. Maxime cestrosphendonis vulnerabantur. Hoc illo bello [8] novum genus teli inventum est. Bipalme spiculum hastili semicubitali [9] infixum erat, crassitudine digiti;
10 huic abiegnae breves [10] pinnae tres, velut sagittis solent, circumdabantur; funda media duo scutalia imparia [11] habebat; cum maiori nisu [12] libratum funditor habena rotaret, excussum velut glans
11 emicabat. Cum et hoc et alio omni genere telorum pars vulnerata militum esset nec facile iam arma [13] fessi sustinerent, instare rex ut dederent se, fidem dare, praemia interdum polliceri. Nec cuiusquam

[1] impar erat Fr.: imperat V.
[2] scutis ab ictu Duker: secutis abiectus V.
[3] alios eminus Fr.: alios seminus V.
[4] ingens Kreyssig: religes V.
[5] propellere Madvig: propter V.
[6] conitebantur Weissenborn: conabantur V.
[7] patebant Fr.: putabant V.
[8] bello Fr.: bellum V.
[9] hastili semicubitali Fr.: astili cuitali V.
[10] abiegnae breves Fr.: ablegegraeue V.
[11] scutalia imparia Ernesti: duo cum alia inpari V.
[12] maiori nisu Kreyssig: maioris sinu V.
[13] arma Fr.: armi V.

military tribune, was in command; he withdrew B.C. 171 the soldiers, who were dismayed by the sudden arrival of the enemy, to a nearby hill, intending to defend himself by the strength of the position since he was no match in numbers and power. There when he had gathered his soldiers in a circle, so that with their close-packed shields they could protect themselves from the blows of arrows and javelins, Perseus, with his men-at-arms surrounding the hill, ordered some to try the ascent from all sides and join battle at close quarters, others to hurl weapons from a distance. A terrific threat surrounded the Romans, for when massed they could not thrust back those who were struggling up the hill, and whenever they broke ranks by charging forward, they were exposed to javelins and arrows. They suffered particularly from the dart-slings.[1] This was a new kind of weapon, invented in that war. A sharp iron two spans long was set in a wooden shaft of half a cubit, a finger in thickness; around this latter three short firwood " feathers," like those usual on arrows, were attached; the sling had in the middle two unequal thongs; when the slinger swung and spun it by the strap with an extra effort, the missile, shaken loose, shot out like a ball.[2] When with this and with every other sort of weapon part of the soldiers had been wounded and it was no longer easy for the weary men to hold up their weapons, the king urged them to surrender, gave them his guaranty, at times offered rewards. But no one's

[1] Cf. Polybius XXVII. 11. Another kind of elaborate sling is described in XXXVIII. xxix. 6.

[2] I.e. the usual leaden sling-bullet.

A.U.C. 583 ad deditionem flectebatur animus, cum ex insperato
12 iam obstinatis mori spes affulsit. Nam cum ex frumentatoribus refugientes quidam in castra nuntiassent consuli circumsideri praesidium, motus periculo tot civium—nam octingenti[1] ferme et omnes Romani erant—cum equitatu ac levi armatura (accesserant nova auxilia, Numidae pedites equitesque et elephanti) castris egreditur et tribunis militum imperat
13 ut legionum signa sequantur. Ipse velitibus ad firmanda levium armorum auxilia adiectis ad tumu-14 lum praecedit.[2] Consulis latera tegunt Eumenes et[3] Attalus et Misagenes, regulus Numidarum.

LXVI. Cum in conspectu[4] prima signa suorum circumsessis fuerunt, Romanis quidem ab ultima[5]
2 desperatione recreatus est animus. Perseus, cui primum omnium fuerat ut contentus fortuito successu, captis aliquot frumentatoribus occisisque, non tereret
3 tempus in obsidione praesidii, secundum, ea quoque temptata utcumque, cum[6] sciret nihil roboris secum esse, dum liceret intacto abire, et ipse hostium adventum elatus successu mansit et, qui phalangem
4 arcesserent, propere misit; quae et[7] serius quam res postulabat et raptim acta, turbata cursu[8] adversus

[1] octingenti Fr.: accc. V.
[2] praecedit Fr.: praecedentis V.
[3] et add. Madvig: om. V.
[4] in conspectu Fr.: inspectu V.
[5] ultima Fr.: ultu V.
[6] cum Fr.: secum V. [7] quae et Madvig: quaet V.
[8] acta turbata cursu Madvig: aptatur turbati cursus V.

mind could be bent to surrender, when in unhoped- B.C. 171 for fashion hope dawned upon men who had already determined to die. For when a few of the foragers, taking refuge in the camp, reported to the consul that the guard was surrounded, he, moved by the danger of so large a number of citizens—for there were about eight hundred, and all Romans—with the cavalry and light troops (there were added the new auxiliaries, the Numidian infantry, cavalry and elephants) marched out of camp and instructed the military tribunes that the legionary units were to follow. He himself, adding the light infantry of the legions to strengthen the light-armed auxiliaries, marched ahead to the hill. Eumenes, Attalus, and Misagenes, the prince of the Numidians, covered the consul's flanks.[1]

LXVI. When the first standards of their fellows came in sight of the beleaguered, the spirits of the Romans indeed were revived from the depths of despair. Perseus, whose best course of all would have been to be satisfied with his chance success in capturing and killing a certain number of foragers, and not to waste time besieging the guard, or, as second best, after trying the latter enterprise too in some fashion, when he became aware that he had no strength on his side, to depart unscathed while he might—Perseus, puffed up by success, both awaited the approach of the enemy himself and sent men hastily to summon the phalanx; this being brought up later than circumstances required and in haste, would have come in confusion from its [1] I interpret this phrase in the military sense, though a similar phrase is used to refer to personal escort, cf. XXXII. xxxix. 8, XL. vi. 4.

A.U.C. 583

instructos et praeparatos erat[1] adventura. Consul
5 anteveniens extemplo proelium conseruit. Primo resistere Macedones; deinde, ut nulla re pares erant, amissis trecentis peditibus, viginti quattuor primoribus equitum ex ala,[2] quam sacram vocant, inter quos Antimachus etiam praefectus alae cecidit,
6 abire conantur. Ceterum iter prope ipso proelio tumultuosius fuit. Phalanx[3] trepido nuntio accita cum raptim duceretur, primo in angustiis captivorum agmini oblata vehiculisque frumento onustis haesit.[4]
7 Ingens ibi vexatio partis utriusque fuit, nullo expectante, dum utcumque[5] explicaretur agmen, sed armatis deicientibus[6] in[7] praeceps impedimenta—neque enim aliter via aperiri poterat—iumentis,
8 cum[8] stimularentur in turba saevientibus. Vix ab incondito agmine captivorum expedierant sese, cum regio agmini perculsisque equitibus occurrunt. Ibi vero clamor iubentium referre signa ruinae quoque prope similem trepidationem fecit, ut, si[9] hostes intrare[10] angustias ausi longius insecuti essent,
9 magna clades accipi potuerit. Consul recepto ex tumulo praesidio contentus modico successu[11] in castra copias reduxit. Sunt qui eo die magno proelio pugnatum auctores sint;[12] octo milia hostium

[1] erat Madvig: erant V. [2] ex ala Fr.: exalia V.
[3] phalanx Novák, phalansabs V: phalanx abs Fr., fortasse rectius.
[4] onustis haesit Bekker: onustiiscaesis V.
[5] dum utcumque J. F. Gronovius: utrumque V.
[6] deicientibus Kreyssig: deitinentibus (sic) V.
[7] in add. Heraeus: om. V.
[8] cum Fr.: neque enim cum V.
[9] si add. Fr.: om. V.
[10] intrare Madvig: introre V.
[11] successu Fr.: corcessu V.
[12] sint Sigonius: sunt V.

forced march against men in formation and ready. B.C. 171
The consul, arriving first, immediately joined battle. At first the Macedonians stood fast; then, as they were in no respect equally matched, with a loss of three hundred infantry and twenty-four of their finest cavalrymen from the squadron which they call sacred,[1] among whom also fell Antimachus the squadron commander, they attempted to retreat. However, the march was almost more of a hurly-burly than the battle itself. While the phalanx, summoned by an alarmed messenger, was being hastily led up, first meeting the column of prisoners and the wagons laden with grain in some narrows, it was stuck. Thereupon there was great turmoil on both sides, with no one waiting till somehow or other the column should be disentangled, but with the men-at-arms hurling the obstructing wagons down the steep slope—for the road could not otherwise be cleared—and the draft-animals, as they were goaded, lashing out at the crowd. Hardly had they freed themselves from the disorganized column of prisoners when they ran into the king's column and the routed cavalry. Then indeed the shouting of those ordering a retreat also produced an alarm almost like a complete disaster, so that if the enemy, daring to enter the narrows, had pursued farther, a great loss might have been incurred. The consul, having picked up the guard from the hill and being satisfied with a moderate success, led his troops back to camp. There are those who declare that a great battle was fought on that day, that eight thousand of the enemy

[1] Cf. above, n. 2, p. 470.

A.U.C. 583 caesa, in his Sopatrum et Antipatrum, regios duces; vivos captos circiter duo milia octingentos, signa militaria capta viginti septem. Nec incruentam victoriam fuisse; supra quattuor milia et trecentos de exercitu consulis cecidisse; signa sinistrae alae quinque amissa.

LXVII. Hic dies et Romanis refecit animos et Persea perculit, ut dies paucos ad Mopselum moratus sepulturae maxime militum amissorum cura, praesidio satis valido ad Gonnum relicto, in Macedoniam reciperet copias. Timotheum quendam ex regiis praefectis cum modica manu relinquit ad Philam, iussum Magnetas ex[1] propinquo temptare. Cum Pellam venisset, exercitu in hiberna dimisso ipse cum Cotye Thessalonicam est profectus. Eo fama adfertur, Autlesbim, regulum Thracum, et[2] Corragum, Eumenis praefectum, in Cotyis fines impetum fecisse et regionem Marenen quam vocant cepisse. Itaque dimittendum Cotyn ad sua tuenda ratus, magnis proficiscentem donis prosequitur. Ducenta talenta, semestre stipendium, equitatui numerat, cum primo annuum[3] dare constituisset.

Consul postquam profectum Persea audivit, ad Gonnum castra movet, si potiri oppido posset. Ante ipsa Tempe in faucibus situm Macedoniae claustra tutissima praebet et in Thessaliam opportu-

[1] ex Kreyssig: et V.
[2] et add. ed. Frobeniana 1535: om. V.
[3] annuum Fr.: anum V.

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. xiii. 3; Eumenes held Gallipoli and adjacent south-eastern Thrace, cf. XXXIX. xxvii. 5.

[2] Since the reckoning is given in Greek money, Livy seems to have followed Polybius here. On the stinginess were killed, among them Sopater and Antipater, B.C. 171 officers of the king, that there were taken alive about two thousand and eight hundred, and that twenty-seven military standards were taken. Nor was the victory bloodless, they say; more than four thousand and three hundred of the consul's army fell, and five standards of the left squadron were lost.

LXVII. This day both revived the spirits of the Romans and dismayed Perseus, so that after a few days' delay at Mopselus, more especially to attend to the burial of the soldiers who had been lost, having left a sufficiently strong garrison at Gonnus he retreated to Macedonia. A certain Timotheus, one of the royal governors, he left with a small force at Phila, with orders to make overtures from near-by to the people of Magnesia. When the king arrived at Pella, he sent his army into winter quarters and himself left with Cotys for Thessalonica. There a report arrived that Autlesbis, a chieftain of the Thracians, and Corragus, Eumenes' governor,[1] had made an attack on the territory of Cotys and had captured the district called Marenê. Therefore Perseus thought best to send Cotys back to protect his own, and marked his departure by great gifts. He paid two hundred talents,[2] a half-year's pay, to the cavalry, although he had planned at first to give a full year's amount.

After the consul heard that Perseus had set out, he moved camp to Gonnus, in case he might be able to take the town. Placed in the entrance to Tempê itself, the town offers a very securely closed door to Macedonia and a sally-port to Thessaly favourable of Perseus, cf. below, XLIV. xxvi., Polybius, XXIX. 8, 2–9, 13.

A.U.C. 583

7 num Macedonibus decursum. Cum et loco et praesidio valido inexpugnabilis urbs[1] esset, abstitit incepto. In Perrhaebiam flexis[2] itineribus Malloea primo impetu capta ac direpta, Tripoli aliaque
8 Perrhaebia recepta, Larisam redit. Inde Eumene atque Attalo domum[3] remissis, Misageni[4] Numidisque hiberna in proximis Thessaliae urbibus distribuit, et partem exercitus ita per totam Thessaliam divisit ut et hiberna commoda omnes haberent[5]
9 et praesidio urbibus essent. Q. Mucium legatum cum duobus milibus ad obtinendam Ambraciam misit. Graecarum civitatium socios omnes praeter Achaeos dimisit.[6] Cum exercitus parte profectus in Achaiam Phthiotim Pteleum desertum fuga oppidanorum diruit a fundamentis, Antronas voluntate
10 incolentium[7] recepit. Ad Larisam deinde exercitum admovit. Urbs deserta erat; in arcem omnis multitudo concesserat; eam oppugnare aggreditur.
11 Primi omnium Macedones, regium praesidium, metu excesserant; a quibus relicti oppidani in deditionem extemplo veniunt. Dubitantem[8] inde utrum Demetrias prius aggredienda foret an in Boeotia aspiciendae res, Thebani vexantibus eos[9] Coronaeis in Boeotiam arcessebant. Ad[10] horum preces,[11] quia hibernis aptior regio quam Magnesia[12] erat, in Boeotiam duxit.

[1] urbs J. F. Gronovius: res V. [2] flexis Fr.: flexit V.
[3] domum Fr.: romam V.
[4] Misageni Madvig: misachin V.
[5] haberent Fr.: habent V.
[6] dimisit Fr.: dimisitcos (sic) V.
[7] voluntate incolentium Madvig: uoluntatem colentium V.
[8] dubitantem Vahlen: dubitari V. [9] eos Fr.: eius V.
[10] ad Fr.: et V. [11] preces Fr.: praeces V.
[12] Magnesia Fr. Magnesiae V.

to the Macedonians. Since both because of its situation and its strong garrison the city was impregnable, the consul abandoned the undertaking. Having turned aside to Perrhaebia, after capturing Malloea at the first assault and sacking it, and recovering the Tripolis and the rest of Perrhaebia, he returned to Larisa. Thence having sent Eumenes and Attalus home, he assigned winter quarters in the nearest Thessalian cities to Misagenes and the Numidians, and scattered a portion of his army throughout all Thessaly in such a way that all had comfortable winter quarters and formed a protection for the cities. His staff-officer Quintus Mucius[1] he sent with two thousand to hold Ambracia. All the allies from the Greek states except the Achaeans he dismissed. With a part of his army he set out into Phthiotic Achaea,[2] razed to the ground Pteleum, which had been abandoned by the flight of its inhabitants, and received Antronae by voluntary surrender of the inhabitants. Then he brought his army up to Larisa. The city was abandoned; the whole population had taken refuge in the citadel; the consul advanced to attack this. First of all the Macedonians, the king's garrison, departed in fear; deserted by these, the townsfolk immediately capitulated. Then as the consul debated whether he should first attack Demetrias or take a look at the situation in Boeotia, the Thebans, harassed by the people of Coronea, called him to Boeotia. In answer to their entreaties, since for winter quarters[3] the district was more suitable than Magnesia, he marched into Boeotia. B.C. 171

[1] Cf. above, n. 1, p. 443. [2] Cf. above, ch. xlii. 1, lvi. 7.
[3] Cf. XXXIII. xxvii. 5.

LIBER XLII PERIOCHA

Q. Fulvius Flaccus censor templum Iunonis Laciniae tegulis marmoreis spoliavit, ut aedem, quam dedicabat, tegeret. Tegulae ex senatus consulto reportatae. Eumenes Asiae rex in senatu de Perseo Macedoniae rege questus est; cuius iniuriae in populum Romanum referuntur. Ob quas bello ei indicto P. Licinius Crassus consul, cui mandatum erat, in Macedoniam transiit, levibusque expeditionibus, equestribus proeliis, in Thessalia cum Perseo . . .[1] eventu pugnavit. Inter Masinissam et Carthaginienses de agro fuit lis.[2] Dies iis a senatu ad disceptandum datus. Legati missi ad socias civitates regesque rogandos, ut in fide permanerent, dubitantibus Rhodiis. Lustrum a censoribus est: censa sunt civium capita $\overline{\text{CCLXVII}}$[3] CCXXXI. Res praeterea adversus Corsos et Liguras prospere gestas continet.

[1] cum Perseo eventu codd: at recc. supplementa varia praebent, e quibus improspero suggerit Rossbach; ego cum Perseo vario eventu malim.

[2] fuit lis. dies iis a senatu Jahn: fuit dictis a senatu codd.

[3] Et summas minores praebent P, codd. recc., ed. princeps; sed cf. supra ch. x.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLII

THE censor Quintus Fulvius Flaccus stripped the temple of Juno Lacinia of its marble tiles, in order to roof the temple which he was dedicating. The tiles, by order of the senate, were taken back. Eumenes, king of Asia, complained before the senate of Perseus, king of Macedonia; the wrong-doings of Perseus were laid before the Roman people for action. Because of these wrong-doings war was declared against him, and Publius Licinius Crassus, the consul, who had been placed in command, crossed to Macedonia and in sallies of light troops and cavalry battles fought with Perseus in Thessaly with [varying ?] [1] outcome. There was a dispute over territory between Masinissa and the Carthaginians. A day for arguing the case was set for them by the senate. Envoys were sent to request the allied states and kings to remain loyal, but the Rhodians wavered. The five-year period was closed by the censors; there were enumerated as citizens 267,231 [2] persons. The book also covers successful campaigns against the Corsicans and Ligurians.

[1] The adjective is missing in the MSS.

[2] The numeral is differently reported in different MSS.; cf. also ch. x of this book.

LIVY

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION

IN FOURTEEN VOLUMES

XIII

BOOKS XLIII—XLV

TRANSLATED BY

ALFRED C. SCHLESINGER, PH.D.

ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF CLASSICS IN OBERLIN COLLEGE

LONDON

WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

MCMLI

CONTENTS

PAGE

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE v

BOOK XLIII 1

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLIII 85

BOOK XLIV 89

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLIV 245

BOOK XLV 247

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLV 413

INDEX OF NAMES 415

MAPS—

1. The Mediterranean
2. Illyria and Macedonia
3. Northern Greece
4. Southern Greece and Asia Minor
5. Italy
6. City of Rome

T. LIVI

AB URBE CONDITA

LIBER XLIII

I. Eadem aestate qua in Thessalia haec gesta sunt [1] . . .,[2] legatus in Illyricum a consule missus [3] opulenta
2 duo oppida oppugnavit. Ceremiam vi atque [4] armis coegit in deditionem; omniaque iis sua concessit, ut opinione clementiae eos, qui Carnuntem, munitam
3 urbem, incolebant, adliceret. Postquam nec ut dederent se compellere neque capere obsidendo poterat, ne duabus oppugnationibus nequiquam fatigatus miles esset, quam prius intactam urbem reliquerat diripuit.
4 Alter consul C. Cassius nec in Gallia, quam sortitus erat, memorabile quicquam gessit et per Illyricum ducere legiones in Macedoniam vano incepto est
5 conatus. Ingressum hoc iter consulem senatus ex

[1] haec gesta sunt Kreyssig: om. V.
[2] lacunam indicavit Sigonius.
[3] a consule missus Fr: a cons. omissus V.
[4] oppugnavit. Ceremiam vi atque Weissenborn, Madvig: oppugnaiuiceremiamiuadque V.

---

[1] The name is lost; perhaps it was the ex-consul Gaius Claudius (cf. XLII. xlix. 9), since the other ex-consul, Mucius, was made a legatus (XLII. lxvii. 9, cf. also lviii. 13).

LIVY

FROM THE FOUNDING OF THE CITY

BOOK XLIII

I. During the same summer in which this campaign B.C. 17 was fought in Thessaly, the staff-officer . . .,[1] sent by the consul into Illyricum, besieged two rich cities. Ceremia [2] he compelled by force of arms to surrender; and he left to its inhabitants all their possessions, in order by his reputation for clemency [3] to entice the dwellers in the walled city of Carnuns. After he had been unable either to induce them to surrender or to capture them by blockade, in order that his soldiery might not be worn out by two sieges and gain nothing, he plundered the city which he had previously left untouched.

Gaius Cassius the second consul failed to accomplish anything of note in Gaul,[4] which had fallen to his lot, and made a vain attempt to lead his legions through Illyricum into Macedonia. The consul's venture on this journey became known to the senate through an

[2] The name is uncertain, and is not mentioned elsewhere; the location of the town can only be conjectured.

[3] The usual practice was to plunder a city which had been stormed, and spare one which surrendered (XXXVII. xxxii. 12).

[4] The active sector of his province of Italy (XLII. xxxii. 4).

Aquileiensium legatis cognovit, qui querentes coloniam suam novam et infirmam necdum satis munitam inter 6 infestas nationes Histrorum et Illyriorum esse, cum peterent ut senatus curae haberet quomodo ea colonia muniretur, interrogati, vellentne eam rem C. Cassio 7 consuli mandari, responderunt Cassium Aquileiam indicto exercitu profectum per Illyricum in Macedoniam esse.[1] Ea res primo incredibilis visa, et pro se quisque credere Carnis forsitan aut Histris bellum 8 illatum. Tum Aquileienses: nihil se ultra scire nec audere adfirmare, quam triginta dierum frumentum militi datum et duces qui ex Italia itinera in Macedo-9 niam nossent conquisitos abductosque. Enimvero senatus indignari tantum consulem ausum, ut suam provinciam relinqueret, in alienam transiret, exer-citum novo periculoso itinere inter exteras gentes [2] duceret, viam tot nationibus in Italiam aperiret.[3] 10 Decernunt frequentes ut C. Sulpicius praetor tris ex senatu nominet legatos, qui eo die proficiscantur ex urbe et, quantum adcelerare possint,[4] Cassium con-11 sulem, ubicumque sit, persequantur; nuntient ne bellum cum ulla gente moveat, nisi cum qua senatus

[1] esse Fr: se V.
[2] exteras gentes Fr: ceterasgetes V.
[3] duceret . . . aperiret J. F. Gronovius: ducere . . . aperire V.
[4] possint Madvig: possent V.

---

[1] It had been founded ten years before, cf. XL. xxxiv. 2.
[2] Cassius would either have had to traverse uninterruptedly mountainous country, as he followed the coast, or to go far inland, approximately to the line of the modern railway to Saloniki, as Philip planned for the Bastarnae; but these would have been aided by friendly tribes, whereas Cassius would have been beyond aid. The Romans had always used embassy from Aquileia, which complained that their B.C. 171 colony was new [1] and weak and had been as yet insufficiently fortified against the surrounding hostile tribes of Histrians and Illyrians; on their requesting that the senate should concern itself with means for fortifying this colony, they were asked if they wished this matter to be entrusted to Gaius Cassius the consul, but replied that Cassius, having mustered his army at Aquileia, had set out through Illyricum for Macedonia. This report seemed unbelievable at first, and the senators each thought to himself that perhaps a campaign against the Carnians or Histrians had been begun. Then the envoys from Aquileia said that they knew and dared assert nothing more than that thirty days' grain had been issued to the soldiery, and that guides who knew the roads from Italy into Macedonia had been sought out and taken along. Then indeed the senate was incensed that the consul had such effrontery as to leave his own district, trespass upon his colleague's, lead his army by a dangerous, untried route [2] among foreign peoples, and leave open to so many tribes the way into Italy.[3] A full senate decreed that the praetor Gaius Sulpicius should name three envoys from among the senators, who should that very day set out from the city and with all possible speed overtake the consul Cassius, wherever he might be; they were to declare to him that he must not engage in war with any people unless the short sea-route from Brundisium to Illyricum and Greece, little as they liked seafaring.

[3] The most recent threat from this direction had been in 186–183 B.C., cf. XXXIX. xxii. 6, xlv. 6–7, liv, though the Transalpine Gauls who had moved in near Aquileia had acted peaceably enough. Cf. the plans of Philip for an invasion of Italy by the Bastarnae, XL. lvii.

A.U.C. 583

12 gerendum censuerit.[1] Legati hi profecti M. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Fulvius, P. Marcius Rex. Metus de consule atque exercitu distulit eo tempore muniendae Aquileiae curam.

II. Hispaniae deinde utriusque legati aliquot
2 populorum in senatum [2] introducti. Ii de magistratuum [3] Romanorum avaritia superbiaque conquesti, nixi genibus ab senatu petierunt ne se socios foedius
3 spoliari vexarique quam hostes [4] patiantur. Cum et alia indigna quererentur, manifestum autem esset pecunias captas, L. Canuleio praetori, qui Hispaniam sortitus erat, negotium datum est ut in singulos, a quibus Hispani pecunias repeterent, quinos recuperatores [5] ex ordine senatorio daret patronosque
4 quos vellent sumendi potestatem faceret. Vocatis in curiam legatis recitatum est senatus consultum,
5 iussique nominare patronos. Quattuor nominaver-

[1] censuerit I. Perizonius: censuerant V.
[2] senatum Sigonius: senatu V.
[3] Ii de magistratuum Fr: idemmagistratuum V.
[4] hostes Fr: hostiis V.
[5] recuperatores Fr: recuperarent V.

[1] Strictly speaking, both the senate and the people had to approve the undertaking of a war: cf. the condemnations of similar unauthorized forays in XXXVIII. xlv. 5 and XLI. vii. 7–8.

the senate had determined on war against them.[1] B.C. 171 The following envoys set out: Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, Marcus Fulvius, Publius Marcius Rex. Fear for the consul and his army displaced for the present any consideration of fortifying Aquileia.

II. Next, envoys of several peoples from each of the Spains were presented to the senate. After complaining of the greed and arrogance of Roman officials,[2] they begged of the senate on bended knees that it would not permit them, its allies, to be more wretchedly despoiled and harassed than its enemies. Since they complained of other acts of injustice also and it was in fact obvious that money had been extorted, the task was assigned to the praetor Lucius Canuleius, to whom Spain [3] had been allotted, to assign for each man, from whom the Spaniards were seeking to recover money, five judges [4] of senatorial rank and to permit the Spaniards to choose any advocates they might wish. The decree of the senate was read to the envoys, who had been summoned to the senate-house, and they were ordered to name their advocates. They named four, Marcus

[2] On the overbearing attitude of Roman officials at this time, cf. below, vii–viii.

[3] The two provinces recognized in 197 B.C. (XXXII. xxviii. 11 and the note) were combined during this war in order to leave one praetor free to command the fleet (171 B.C., XLII. xxxi. 9; presumably in 170; 168, XLIV. xvii. 9; in 167, the two provinces were again separated, XLV. xvi. 1).

[4] Sometimes such a board was chosen by the parties to the case, either from their own number, or from a panel proposed by the magistrate in charge, but several inscriptions (e.g., C.I.L.[2] I. 585, p. 460. xxxiv) mention choice of the arbiters by the magistrate. Recuperatores (literally "recoverers") were usually concerned with a claim involving Romans vs. foreigners. As foreigners, the Spaniards had to be represented by Roman advocates.

A.U.C. 583

unt, M. Porcium Catonem, P. Cornelium Cn. F. Scipionem, L. Aemilium L. F. Paulum,[1] C. Sulpicium
6 Gallum. Cum M. Titinio primum, qui praetor A. Manlio M. Iunio consulibus in citeriore Hispania fuerat, recuperatores sumpserunt. Bis [2] ampliatus, 7 tertio absolutus est reus. Dissensio inter duarum provinciarum legatos est orta [3]; citerioris Hispaniae populi M. Catonem et P.[4] Scipionem, ulterioris L. Paulum et Gallum Sulpicium patronos sumpserunt.
8 Ad recuperatores adducti a citerioribus populis P.
9 Furius Philus, ab ulterioribus M. Matienus; ille Sp. Postumio Q. Mucio consulibus triennio ante, hic biennio [5] prius L. Postumio M.[6] Popilio consulibus
10 praetor fuerat. Gravissimis criminibus accusati ambo ampliatique; cum dicenda de integro causa esset, excusati [7] exilii causa solum vertisse. Furius Prae-
11 neste, Matienus Tibur exulatum abierunt. Fama

[1] Scipionem, L. Aemilium L. F. Paulum Pighius: scipiol. aemiliumin. paulu V.
[2] bis Fr: vis V.
[3] est orta Fr: estora V.
[4] P. add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[5] hic biennio Fr: hincuiennio V.
[6] M. Fr: C. V.
[7] excusati Fr: excusatio V.

---

[1] He had benefited the province in 195 B.C. by establishing order and developing mining, cf. XXXIV. xxi. A speech in this case seems to have been once extant under the title Pro Hispanis de frumento (Charisius II. 198. 224 Keil) in which Cato attacked Publius Furius Philus, praetor of Nearer Spain in 174 B.C. (XLI. xxi. 3, cf. below, 8) for unjust valuation of grain received as tribute (Asconius on Cicero Divinatio in M. Caecilium 66, Cato accusavit . . . P. Furium pro iisdem (Lusitanis) propter iniquissimam aestimationem frumenti), cf. below, 12.

Porcius Cato,[1] Publius Cornelius Scipio son of Gnaeus, B.C. 171
Lucius Aemilius Paulus son of Lucius,[2] and Gaius Sulpicius Gallus. The case of Marcus Titinius, who had been praetor in Nearer Spain during the consulship of Aulus Manlius and Marcus Junius,[3] was first taken up by a board of judges.[4] The trial was twice adjourned, and at the third session the defendant was acquitted. A dispute arose between the envoys of the two provinces; the peoples of Nearer Spain chose as advocates Marcus Cato and Publius Scipio, those of Farther Spain took Lucius Paulus and Sulpicius Gallus. There were brought before judges by the peoples of the nearer province Publius Furius Philus, by those of the farther province Marcus Matienus[5]; the former had been praetor three years before, in the consulship of Spurius Postumius and Quintus Mucius, the latter had served two years before, when Lucius Postumius and Marcus Popilius were consuls. Both were accused on most serious charges and the cases were adjourned; when the time came for a fresh trial, the defence reported that they had left Roman territory to go into exile. Furius went for his exile to Praeneste, Matienus to

[2] Scipio had been praetor in Farther Spain in 193 B.C. (XXXIV. xliii. 7 records his assignment, XXXV. i. 3–12, his exploits), and Paulus had been praetor of Farther Spain in 190 B.C. (his assignment in XXXVI. ii. 6; his activities, XXXVII. lvii. 5–6).

[3] In 178 B.C.; Titinius was also in Spain the following two years (XLI. ix. 3, xv. 11, xxvi. 1). A namesake was City Praetor in 178.

[4] This is the earliest known trial of an official thus accused by provincials; previous complaints of like nature (cf. XXIX. xvi–xix, XXXIX. iii. 1–3, below, v) had been adjusted by the senate directly, or through the consuls.

[5] Cf. XLI. xxviii. 5, where the first name is given as Gaius.

A.U.C. 583

erat prohiberi a patronis nobiles ac potentes compellare: auxitque [1] eam suspicionem Canuleius praetor, quod omissa ea re dilectum habere instituit, dein repente in provinciam abiit, ne [2] plures ab Hispanis 12 vexarentur. Ita praeteritis silentio obliteratis in futurum tamen consultum ab [3] senatu Hispanis, quod impetrarunt, ne frumenti aestimationem magistratus Romanus haberet neve cogeret vicensimas vendere Hispanos, quanti ipse vellet.[4] et ne praefecti in oppida sua ad pecunias cogendas imponerentur.

III. Et alia novi generis hominum ex Hispania le-
2 gatio venit. Ex militibus Romanis et ex Hispanis mulieribus, cum quibus conubium non esset, natos se memorantes, supra quattuor milia hominum, orabant [5]
3 ut sibi oppidum in quo habitarent daretur. Senatus decrevit, uti nomina sua apud L. Canuleium profiterentur eorumque, si quos manumisissent,[6] eos

[1] auxitque eam Fr : auxiadque V : atque auxit Hartel.
[2] abiit, ne Fr : abitinere V.
[3] tamen consultum ab Kreyssig : consultamentumab V.
[4] Hispanos, quanti ipse vellet Fr : hispancnisquantiipsevellent V.
[5] hominum orabant Fr : hominumexhispaniaorabant V.
[6] manumisissent Madvig : manumissent V : manumisisset Fr.

[1] Polybius VI. xiv. 7 mentions these towns and Naples as asyla for exiles, and praises as a form of Roman moderation the institution of voluntary exile. In these private suits the exile was apparently not made official by the "ban of fire and water," as in cases prosecuted by the state, cf. XXVI. iii. 12. Exiles automatically surrendered their Roman citizenship and took up that of the town in which they took refuge.

[2] Roman officials are forbidden to demand an arbitrary money-equivalent for grain furnished them, perhaps for their own use and that of their army; nor are they arbitrarily to set the price paid for the grain which the Spaniards were required to sell to the Romans, in order to help maintain the

Tibur.[1] There was a rumour that the advocates B.C. 171 would not allow accusations against men of rank and influence; this suspicion was increased by Canuleius the praetor, who gave up this investigation, began to hold a levy, and then suddenly left for his province, so that no more men should be assailed by the Spaniards. Though bygones were thus shrouded in silence, the senate voted for the future what the Spaniards had requested—that a Roman official should not set the price for grain, nor compel the Spaniards to sell their five-per-cent quotas [2] at the price he wished, and that no officers should be placed over their towns to collect money.

III. Another embassy, also from Spain, of a novel class of people, arrived. Stating that they were the children of Roman soldiers and of Spanish women, between whom legal marriage could not exist,[3] and that they numbered over four thousand souls, they asked that a town be given them in which to live. The senate decreed that they should declare before Lucius Canuleius the praetor their own names and the names of any slaves they might have set free, flow of grain to Italy. Whereas in Sicily tithes of grain constituted a tax traditional in the region and continued by the Romans, in Spain the tax (stipendium) paid to the Romans as overlords seems to have been in money, or perhaps in precious metals; the twentieths here mentioned were not a tax, but a compulsory sale, like the second tithe which might on occasion be required of Sicily. The size of the quota perhaps reflects the lesser fertility of Spain. Special levies of money and grain from Spain are mentioned in XXIX. iii. 5 (a punitive levy), XXX. iii. 2 (a war-levy for the army in Africa) and XXX. xxvi. 6 (perhaps the regular tax).

[3] Children of such unrecognized marriages were not illegitimate in the modern sense, but had the mother's status, so that these people were legally Spaniards.

A.U.C. 583

4 Carteiam ad Oceanum deduci placere; qui Carteiensium domi manere vellent, potestatem fieri, uti numero colonorum essent, agro adsignato. Latinam eam coloniam esse [1] libertinorumque appellari.

5 Eodem tempore ex Africa et Gulussa regulus, Masinissae filius,[2] legatus patris, et Carthaginienses
6 venerunt. Gulussa prior in senatum introductus et quae missa erant ad bellum Macedonicum a patre suo exposuit; et si qua praeterea vellent imperare [3] praestaturum merito populi Romani est pollicitus, et monuit patres conscriptos ut a fraude Carthagi-
7 niensium caverent: classis eos magnae parandae consilium cepisse,[4] specie pro Romanis et adversus Macedonas; ubi ea [5] parata instructaque esset, ipsorum fore potestatis, quem hostem aut socium habeant. Hanc iniec . . .[6]

[1] esse J. F. Gronovius: fuisse V.
[2] Gulussa regulus, Masinissae filius Kreyssig: gulussamaisinissaeregulusfilius V: G., M. regis filius Fr.
[3] imperare Fr: imperarent V.
[4] cepisse Fr: coepisse V.
[5] Macedonas; ubi ea Fr: macedoniasubea V.
[6] "fortasse supplendum Hanc iniectam patribus curam "—Weissenborn–Müller; desunt 4 quaterniones.

[1] Carteia was at the head of the Bay of Algeciras, just west of Gibraltar.

[2] I.e., they might not keep their former land, but must take a share along with the newcomers.

[3] This was the first colony outside of the Italian peninsula to be given Latin rights; it was, in legal theory, an autonomous ally of Rome, whose citizens had the rights of trade and intermarriage with Romans.

[4] The previous story of the boundary dispute between these parties is told in XLII. xxiii–xxiv.

[5] As related in XLII. lxii. 2, lxv. 12–14, lxvii. 8.

[6] The Carthaginians had been left with only ten triremes (the cruisers of this period) at the end of the Second Punic and that it was the pleasure of the senate that these B.C. 171 people should be settled at Carteia near the Ocean;[1] any present inhabitants of Carteia who wished to remain at home would have the opportunity to be members of the colony, but on assigned land.[2] This colony was to have Latin rights[3] and to be called the freedmen's colony.

At the same time there came from Africa both Prince Gulussa, the son of Masinissa, as ambassador for his father, and Carthaginian envoys.[4] Gulussa was presented to the senate first, and set forth what supplies had been sent by his father for the Macedonian campaign[5]; he also promised that if they wished to order anything further, his father would furnish it, as due return to the Roman people, and he warned the senators to beware of treachery from the Carthaginians; they had adopted the plan, he added, of preparing a large fleet,[6] ostensibly for the Romans and against the Macedonians; when this fleet should be ready and equipped, the Carthaginians would be free to decide for themselves who should be considered an enemy or who an ally. The instilling of this [suspicion caused the senate] . . .[7]

War (XXX. xxxvii. 3); the treaty did not expressly forbid the rebuilding of the fleet, but the Romans would no doubt have prevented such action, except for the reason here alleged by the Carthaginians; on naval help to Rome by the Carthaginians, cf. XXXVI. xlii. 2 and XLII. lvi. 6.

[7] Four quaternions are lost from the MS. at this point. The following matters were treated: the outcome of the dispute between Masinissa and Carthage; the choice of magistrates and their provinces for 170 B.C.—the consuls were Aulus Hostilius Mancinus for Macedonia and Aulus Atilius Serranus for Italy (cf. below), while the praetor Lucius Hortensius received the fleet; the mistreatment of Coronea by Licinius (cf. below, iv. 5 and 11, and the Summary); the defeat of the

A.U.C. 584

IV. . . . tis tantum exinde pavorem[1] ingressi castra, ostentantes capita, fecerunt, ut, si admotus extemplo exercitus foret, capi castra potuerint. 2 Tum quoque fuga ingens facta est; et erant qui legatos mittendos ad pacem precibus petendam censerent; civitatesque complures eo nuntio audito in 3 deditionem venerunt. Quibus purgantibus sese culpamque in duorum amentiam conferentibus, qui 4 se ultro ad poenam ipsi obtulissent, cum veniam dedisset praetor, profectus extemplo ad alias civitates omnibus imperata facientibus quieto exercitu pacatum agrum, qui paulo ante ingenti tumultu arserat, 5 peragravit. Haec lenitas praetoris, qua sine sanguine ferocissimam gentem domuerat, eo gratior plebi patribusque fuit, quo crudelius avariusque in Graecia bellatum et ab consule Licinio et ab Lucretio 6 praetore erat. Lucretium tribuni plebis absentem contionibus adsiduis lacerabant, cum rei publicae causa abesse excusaretur; sed tum adeo vicina etiam inexplorata erant ut is eo tempore in agro suo Antiati esset aquamque[2] ex manubiis Antium ex flumine

[1] exinde Kreyssig, pavorem Fr: extitit pavor V; ex fiducia pavorem M. Müller; coniecturam Kreyssigii non recipiunt edd.

[2] aquamque Fr: quamque V.

---

praetor Lucretius at Oreüs (Plutarch, Aemilius Paullus ix); the secession of the Epirotes and Hostilius' narrow escape from them (cf. below, xxi. 4, Polybius XXVII. 13–14, Diodorus XXX. 5); Hostilius' unsuccessful campaign (cf. XLIV. ii. 6 and xxxvi. 10); Macedonian successes against the Dardani and Illyrians (cf. below, xix. 14, the Summary, and Orosius iv. 20); and the flare-up in Spain (cf. the Summary), the account of which comes to a conclusion as the text resumes.

IV. . . . they thereafter[1] caused such terror as B.C. 170 they entered the camp, displaying the heads, that if the army had been brought up at once, the camp might have been taken. Even as it was, a great panic took place, and there were those who advised sending envoys to beg for peace; many cities, too, on hearing this news, offered themselves in surrender. These cities cleared themselves and placed the blame on the folly of two men[2] who had of their own accord gone to meet their punishment, and the praetor, having accepted these excuses, set out at once for the other cities and, since everybody obeyed his commands, passed without using his army through a region, now peaceful, which shortly before had been aflame with a huge uprising. This clemency of the praetor, whereby without bloodshed he had tamed a very war-like people, was the more pleasing to the Roman commons and the Fathers because the campaign in Greece had been conducted with too much cruelty and greed by both the consul Licinius and Lucretius the praetor. Lucretius was assailed in his absence by the tribunes of the people in meeting after meeting, although it was stated in his behalf that he was absent in the service of the state; but in that day even the neighbourhood of the city was such unknown territory that he was at that time on his estate at Antium[3] and was engaged in bringing water to Antium from the River Loracina[4] at the

[1] "thereafter" is a conjecture not usually accepted by editors. The "heads" evidently belonged to two leaders of the revolt; those who brought them to the Spanish camp may have been released prisoners.

[2] Olonicus was the chief rebel, according to the Summary.

[3] Less than 35 miles from Rome.

[4] A small stream east of the city.

A.U.C. 584

7 Loracinae duceret. Id opus centum triginta milibus aeris locasse dicitur; tabulis quoque pictis ex praeda
8 fanum Aesculapi exornavit. Invidiam infamiamque ab Lucretio averterunt [1] in Hortensium, successorem eius, Abderitae legati flentes ante curiam querentesque oppidum suum ab Hortensio expugnatum ac
9 direptum esse: causum excidii fuisse urbi, quod, cum centum milia denarium et tritici quinquaginta milia modium imperaret,[2] spatium petierint, quo de ea re et ad Hostilium consulem et Romam mitterent
10 legatos. Vixdum ad consulem se pervenisse et audisse oppidum expugnatum, principes securi per-
11 cussos, sub corona ceteros venisse.[3] Indigna res senatui [4] visa, decreveruntque eadem de Abderitis, quae de Coronaeis [5] decreverant priore anno, eademque pro contione edicere Q. Maenium praetorem
12 iusserunt. Et legati duo, C. Sempronius Blaesus Sex. Iulius Caesar, ad restituendos in libertatem
13 Abderitas missi. Iisdem mandatum, ut et Hostilio consuli et Hortensio praetori nuntiarent, senatum [6] Abderitis iniustum bellum illatum conquirique omnes,

[1] averterunt Fr: averterent V.
[2] imperaret Fr: impetraret V.
[3] sub corona ceteros venisse. Fr: coronasubceterosvenisseetaudisse V.
[4] Indigna res senatui J. F. Gronovius: indignesenatui V.
[5] quae de Coronaeis Fr: quecoroneis V.
[6] nuntiarent, senatum Fr: nuntiarentsenatununtiarent V.

[1] According to Valerius Maximus I. viii. 2 this temple was earlier than that of Aesculapius at Rome.
[2] Abdera was apparently a free ally of Rome.
[3] This city of Boeotia, an opponent of Rome, cf. XLII. xliv. 4, lxiii. 3, had been severely handled by the consul Licinius, cf. above, sec. 5, and the Summary, also Zonaras 9. 22. Livy's account of the event has been lost, cf. above, p. 13, n. 7.

cost of his spoils. He is said to have let the contract B.C. 170 for this work at one hundred and thirty thousand asses; he also decorated with paintings from the booty the temple of Aesculapius.[1] Disapprobation and disgrace were diverted from Lucretius to Hortensius, his successor, by envoys from Abdera,[2] who wept before the senate-house and complained that their city had been stormed and plundered by Hortensius; the reason for the destruction of the city had been, they said, that when the praetor had ordered a hundred thousand denarii and fifty thousand pecks of wheat, they had asked for a stay, during which they might send envoys about the matter to the consul Hostilius and to Rome. Hardly had they come to the consul when they heard that their town had been stormed, their leading men beheaded with the axe, and the rest sold at auction. This seemed to the senate a disgraceful occurrence, and they issued the same decree about the people of Abdera which they had issued the preceding year about the people of Coronea,[3] and instructed Quintus Maenius the praetor [4] to make a similar proclamation before an assembly. Furthermore, two envoys, Gaius Sempronius Blaesus and Sextus Julius Caesar, were sent to restore the people of Abdera to freedom. To these same envoys instructions were given to inform both Hostilius the consul and Hortensius the praetor that the senate had resolved that an improper war had been undertaken against the people of Abdera, and that it was just that all who were [4] Apparently the praetor in charge of aliens (peregrinus), since in ch. vi. 10 he receives the Lampsacenes as allies; the city praetor, Marcus Raecius, was absent, cf. below, ix. 6 and the note.

A.U.C. 584

qui in servitute sint, et restitui in libertatem aequum censere.

V. Eodem tempore de C. Cassio, qui consul priore anno fuerat, tum tribunus militum [1] in Macedonia cum A. Hostilio erat, querellae ad senatum delatae sunt, et legati regis Gallorum Cincibili venerunt.[2] 2 Frater eius verba in senatu fecit questus Alpinorum populorum agros, sociorum suorum, depopulatum C. Cassium [3] esse et inde multa milia hominum in 3 servitutem abripuisse. Sub idem [4] tempus Carnorum Histrorumque et Iapydum [5] legati venerunt: duces sibi ab consule Cassio primum imperatos, qui in Macedoniam ducenti exercitum iter monstrarent; 4 pacatum ab se tamquam ad aliud bellum [6] gerendum abisse. Inde ex medio regressum itinere hostiliter peragrasse [7] fines suos; caedes [8] passim rapinasque et incendia facta; nec se ad id locorum scire, propter quam causam consuli pro hostibus fuerint. Et 5 regulo Gallorum absenti et his populis responsum est senatum ea quae facta querantur, neque scisse futura, neque, si sint facta, probare. Sed indicta causa damnari absentem consularem virum iniurium 6 esse, cum is rei publicae causa absit; ubi ex Macedonia redisset C. Cassius, tum, si coram eum arguere

[1] tum tribunus militum Fr: cumtribunismilitibus V.
[2] venerunt Fr: tenuerunt V.
[3] depopulatum C. Cassium Fr: depopulorumc. cassius V.
[4] idem Kreyssig: id V.
[5] et Iapydum Fr: pydum V.
[6] aliud bellum Fr: aliudidbellum V.
[7] ex medio regressum itinere hostiliter peragrasse Fr: exmediocregressumhostiliteritinereperagrasse V.
[8] caedes Kreyssig: duces V.

enslaved should be sought out and restored to freedom. B.C. 170

V. At this same time complaints were made to the senate about Gaius Cassius, who had been consul the year before and was then a tribune of the soldiers[1] in Macedonia with Aulus Hostilius, and envoys of Cincibilus, a king of the Gauls, arrived. The king's brother spoke before the senate, complaining that Gaius Cassius had ravaged the land of the Alpine tribes, their allies, and had dragged thence into slavery many thousand persons. About the same time envoys of the Carnians, Histrians, and Iapydes arrived; they said, first, that guides had been demanded of them by the consul Cassius, to show him the way as he was leading his army to Macedonia; he had left them peaceably as if to wage a war elsewhere. Next, that returning from the middle of his journey, he had traversed their territory as an enemy; slaughter, pillage and burning had taken place everywhere; nor did they know to that very minute why they had been treated as enemies by the consul. Both to the absent prince of the Gauls and to these peoples the answer was given that the senate neither had known that these occurrences of which they complained would take place nor, if they had taken place, did the senate approve. But to condemn an ex-consul in his absence without a trial would be an injustice, since he was absent in the service of the state; when Gaius Cassius should have returned from Macedonia, then, if they wished

[1] Cassius seems to have obtained this position directly after his consulship, to avoid returning to Rome and giving an account of his hare-brained attempt to reach Macedonia from north Italy (above, ch. i. 4–12).

u.c. 584 vellent, cognita re senatum daturum operam uti 7 satisfiat. Nec responderi tantum iis gentibus, sed legatos mitti, duos ad regulum trans Alpis, tres circa eos populos placuit, qui indicarent, quae patrum 8 sententia esset.[1] Munera mitti legatis ex binis milibus aeris censuerunt: duobus fratribus regulis[2] haec praecipua, torques duo ex quinque pondo auri facti et vasa argentea quinque ex viginti pondo et duo equi phalerati cum agasonibus et equestria arma ac sagula,[3] et comitibus eorum vestimenta, 9 liberis servisque. Haec missa: illa petentibus data, ut denorum equorum iis commercium esset educendi-10 que ex Italia potestas fieret. Legati cum Gallis missi trans Alpis C. Laelius, M. Aemilius Lepidus, ad ceteros populos C. Sicinius, P. Cornelius Blasio, T. Memmius.

VI. Multarum simul Graeciae Asiaeque civitatium
2 legati Romam convenerunt. Primi Athenienses introducti; ii se,[4] quod navium habuerint militumque 3 P. Licinio consuli et C. Lucretio praetori misisse exposuerunt; quibus eos non usos frumenti sibi centum milia imperasse: quod, quamquam sterilem terram ararent,[5] ipsosque etiam agrestis peregrino

[1] esset Fr: esse V.

[2] duobus fratribus regulis Fr: duofratresregulis V: fratri reguli Madvig, recipiunt edd.: erant duo fratres reguli Harant.

[3] arma ac sagula Fr: armatautsagula V: arma et sagula Madvig.

[4] introducti; ii se Fr: introductiipse V.

[5] ararent Nipperdey: arent V.

[1] Lepidus was chief of the Senate for the second time, and pontifex maximus, cf. XL. li. 1, and below, ch. xv. 6; Laelius was probably the noted friend of Scipio Africanus; this embassy seems then to have been regarded as very important; to accuse him to his face, on hearing the case the B.C. 170 senate would see to it that amends were made. It was voted not only to make a reply to these peoples, but to send envoys, two to the prince beyond the Alps and three to the several other peoples; the envoys were to announce what the opinion pronounced by the Fathers was. They determined to send to the envoys gifts of two thousand asses apiece and to the two princely brothers the following special gifts, two twisted necklaces made of five pounds of gold and five silver vessels of twenty pounds, and two horses with trappings for head and chest, along with their grooms, and cavalry weapons and military cloaks, and to the princes' attendants, both free and slave, garments. These things were sent; the following was granted at their request—that they should have the privilege of buying ten horses apiece and of exporting them from Italy. As envoys there were sent with the Gauls across the Alps Gaius Laelius and Marcus Aemilius Lepidus,[1] and to the other peoples, Gaius Sicinius, Publius Cornelius Blasio, and Titus Memmius.

VI. At the same time envoys from a large number of the states of Greece and Asia gathered in Rome. The Athenians were presented first; they pointed out that they had sent their whole fleet and army to Publius Licinius the consul and Gaius Lucretius the praetor; these officers had not employed their forces, but had ordered a hundred thousand pecks of grain; although they tilled a barren soil and supported even their farmers on imported grain, yet they had the members of the other embassy are not otherwise known, unless Sicinius was not Gaius, but the Gnaeus Sicinius mentioned in XLII. ix. 8 and elsewhere.

u.c. 584 frumento alerent, tamen, ne deessent officio, confecisse; et alia quae imperarentur praestare paratos
4 esse. Milesii nihil, quod [1] praestitissent, memorantes, si quid imperare ad bellum senatus vellet
5 praestare se paratos esse polliciti sunt. Alabandenses templum Urbis Romae se fecisse commemoravere [2] ludosque anniversarios ei divae instituisse;
6 et coronam auream quinquaginta pondo, quam in Capitolio ponerent donum Iovi optimo maximo, attulisse et scuta equestria trecenta; ea, cui iussissent, tradituros. Donum ut in Capitolio ponere et sacri-
7 ficare liceret, petebant. Hoc et [3] Lampsaceni,
8 octoginta pondo coronam afferentes, petebant, commemorantes discessisse se a Perseo,[4] postquam Romanus exercitus [5] in Macedoniam venisset, cum
9 sub dicione Persei et ante Philippi fuissent. Pro eo et quod imperatoribus Romanis omnia praestitissent, id se tantum orare, ut in amicitiam populi

[1] quod add. Madvig: om. V.
[2] commemoravere Hertz: commemorave V: commemoraverunt Fr.
[3] et add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V: etiam add. Weissenborn.
[4] discessisse se a Perseo Fr: discessisseeaperseo V.
[5] Romanus exercitus Fr: romanoexercitu V.

[1] Such a temple had been built by Smyrna in 195 B.C., Tacitus, Annals IV. 56. The conception of Rome as a goddess was quite un-Roman; it was invented by Greeks, adopted by Roman poets (e.g. Vergil, Aeneid VI. 781–7, Lucan, Pharsalia I. 186–192), but not officially adopted as part of Roman religion till the reign of Hadrian (Cassius Dio LXIX. 4. 3). The divinity of cities, either personified or represented by their "Fortune," seems like a last freakish form of the gathered this amount so as not to fail in their duty; B.C. 170 and they were ready to furnish other things too which might be ordered. The Milesians, without mentioning anything which they had furnished, promised that if the senate wished to order anything for the war they were ready to furnish it. The envoys of Alabanda announced that they had built a temple to the City of Rome,[1] and had established annual games in honour of that divinity; they had also brought with them a golden crown of fifty pounds' weight to place in the Capitol as a gift to Jupiter Greatest and Best, besides three hundred cavalry shields; these they would deliver to whomever the senate ordered. They asked permission to place their gift in the Capitol and to offer sacrifice. The same request was also made by the people of Lampsacus, who brought a crown of eighty pounds' weight,[2] and called to mind that they had abandoned Perseus, after a Roman army had come into Macedonia, although they had been subject to Perseus and previously to Philip.[3] In return for this and for their action in furnishing the Roman generals with everything, they asked only that they might be glorification of the "polis" found in Aristotle (Politics I. i. 11: "Thus also the city-state is prior in nature to the household and to each of us individually. For the whole must necessarily be prior to the part. . . ." tr. Rackham, L.C.L.).

[2] Perhaps a gift to the goddess Roma, like the similar but more lavish gift of Rhodes when in the bad graces of the Romans (Polybius XXX. 5. 4).

[3] This statement may be inaccurate; Lampsacus declared itself independent of Antiochus in 196 B.C. (XXXIII. xxxviii. 3) and when last heard of (XXXVII. xxxv. 2, 190 B.C.) was apparently recognized as independent; perhaps Livy or his source has assumed that Lampsacus had abandoned Perseus at the time when it came forward as an ally of Rome.

A.U.C. 584

Romani reciperentur, et, si pax cum Perseo fieret, exciperentur, ne in regiam potestatem reciderent.
10 Ceteris legatis comiter responsum; Lampsacenos [1] in sociorum formulam referre Q. Maenius praetor iussus. Munera omnibus in singulos binum milium aeris data. Alabandenses scuta reportare ad A. Hostilium consulem in Macedoniam iussi.
11 Et ex Africa legati simul Carthaginiensium et Masinissae venerunt: legati Carthaginiensium [2] tritici deciens centum milia et hordei quingenta [3] indicantes se ad mare devecta habere, ut, quo senatus
12 censuisset, deportarent; id munus officiumque suum scire minus esse quam pro meritis populi Romani et voluntate sua; sed saepe alias bonis in rebus utriusque populi se gratorum fideliumque socium [4] muneri-
13 bus functos esse. Item Masinissae legati tritici eandem summam polliciti et mille et ducentos equites, duodecim elephantos; et si quid aliud opus esset, uti imperaret senatus: aeque propenso animo et ea [5] et, quae ipse ultro pollicitus sit, praestaturum

[1] comiter responsum; Lampsacenos Fr: committerepossumlamsacenos V.

[2] et Masinissae venerunt; legati Carthaginiensium add. H. J. Müller; eadem, legati omisso, Crévier: om. V.

[3] quingenta Sigonius: quinquaginta V.

[4] populi se gratorum fideliumque socium Fr: populisegrecatorumfideliumq. sociumque V.

[5] et ea add. H. J. Müller: om. V.

[1] Apparently they wanted an entente with Rome, without the precise and formal undertakings of an alliance (societas). Usually, "friendship" and "alliance" go hand in hand (e.g., XXXVI. iii. 8, XLV. xx. 8), but Rhodes maintained a state of "friendship" without alliance for 140 years (cf. below, XLV. xxv. 7–9) because, in the words of Polybius (XXX. 5. 8, tr. White, L.C.L.), "As they wished none of the admitted to friendship[1] with the Roman people, and B.C. 170 that if peace should be made with Perseus, provision should be made for them, to prevent their reverting to the control of the king. A kindly answer was given the other envoys; as for the Lampsacenes, the praetor Quintus Maenius was ordered to enroll them as allies. Gifts of two thousand asses apiece were given to all the envoys. Those from Alabanda were ordered to carry the shields back to Aulus Hostilius, the consul in Macedonia.

Envoys from Africa also arrived, both Carthaginians and those of Masinissa together. The Carthaginian envoys reported that they had conveyed to the sea a million pecks of wheat and five hundred thousand of barley, in order that they might deliver it wherever the senate should determine; they said that this gift and act of duty of theirs was, they knew, less than a return for the favours of the Roman people and less than they would wish; but they had often, on other occasions when both peoples had been prospering, fulfilled the duties of grateful and faithful allies. Likewise the envoys of Masinissa promised the same total of wheat as well as twelve hundred cavalry and twelve elephants;[2] they requested the senate to order anything else which might be needed, for the king would furnish such things with as good a will as he gave what he, of his own accord, had kings and princes to despair of gaining their help and alliance, they did not desire to run in harness with Rome and engage themselves by oaths and treaties, but preferred to remain unembarrassed and able to reap profit from any quarter"; they sought alliance only when threatened with possible conquest as the alternative.

[2] He had previously sent a thousand cavalry, a thousand infantry, and twenty-two elephants (XLII. lxii. 2).

A.U.C. 584

14 esse. Gratiae et Carthaginiensibus et regi actae, rogatique ut ea quae pollicerentur[1] ad Hostilium consulem in Macedoniam deportarent. Legatis in singulos binum milium aeris munera missa.

VII. Cretensium legatis commemorantibus se quantum sibi imperatum a P. Licinio consule esset 2 sagittariorum in Macedoniam misisse, cum interrogati non infitiarentur[2] apud Persea maiorem numerum sagittariorum suorum[3] quam apud Romanos militare, 3 responsum est, si Cretenses bene ac naviter destinarent potiorem populi Romani quam regis Persei 4 amicitiam habere, senatum quoque Romanum iis tamquam certis sociis responsum daturum esse. Interea nuntiarent suis placere senatui dare operam Cretenses, ut quos milites intra praesidia regis Persei haberent eos primo quoque tempore domum revocarent.

5 Cretensibus cum hoc responso dimissis Chalcidenses vocati, quorum legatio ipso introitu movit,[4] quod Micythion,[5] princeps eorum, pedibus captus 6 lectica est introlatus; ultimae necessitatis extemplo visa res, in qua ita affecto excusatio valetudinis aut ne ipsi quidem petenda visa foret aut data petenti 7 non esset. Cum sibi nihil vivi reliquum praeterquam

[1] rogatique ut ea quae pollicerentur Fr: rogatiquaeuteaquaeuteaquaepollicerentur V.

[2] in Macedoniam misisse, cum interrogati non infitiarentur Fr: inmacedoniasemisisseticuminfitiatinoninterrogarentur V.

[3] suorum add. Harant: om. V.

[4] introitu movit H. J. Müller: introituobit V: introitu, ob id Fr.

[5] Micythion Bekker: micion V.

---

[1] A force of nearly three thousand is mentioned in XLII. li. 7; they participated in at least one battle (XLII. lviii. 6).

promised. Thanks both to the Carthaginians and to the king were expressed and they were asked to deliver what they had promised to Hostilius the consul in Macedonia. To each of the envoys a gift of two thousand asses was sent. B.C. 170

VII. The Cretan envoys reported that they had sent to Macedonia as large a force of archers as the consul Publius Licinius had stipulated, but when they did not deny, on being questioned, that a larger number of their archers were serving with Perseus [1] than with the Romans, they were told in reply that if the people of Crete intended truly and zealously to prize the friendship of the Roman People above that of King Perseus, the Roman senate would also respond to them as it did to indubitable allies. Meanwhile, let them report to their people that it was the pleasure of the senate that the people of Crete should make a point of recalling home at the first possible moment those soldiers whom they might have within the lines of King Perseus.

After the Cretans had been dismissed with this reply, the envoys of Chalcis were summoned; their embassy stirred sympathy by its very entrance, because Micythion,[2] their chief, having an affliction of the feet, was borne in on a litter; at once the occasion seemed one of direst necessity, in which an excuse on grounds of health for one so afflicted either had seemed to the victim himself something for which he should not ask, or had not been granted at his request. After he had begun by saying that no part of him was still living except the tongue where-

[2] The name is given in the MS. as Micion; but it seems probable that the Romanophile mentioned in XXXV. xxxviii. 1 and 1–li is meant.

A.U.C. 584

linguam ad deplorandas patriae suae calamitates praefatus esset, exposuit civitatis primum suae benefacta et vetera et ea, quae Persei bello praesti-8 tissent ducibus exercitibusque Romanis; tum quae primo C. Lucretius in populares suos praetor Romanus superbe, avare, crudeliter fecisset,[1] deinde quae tum
9 cum maxime L. Hortensius faceret. Quem ad modum omnia sibi, etiam iis, quae patiantur, tristiora, patienda esse ducant potius quam fide decedant,[2] sic, quod ad Lucretium Hortensiumque attineret, scire tutius fuisse claudere portas quam in urbem eos
10 accipere. Qui exclusissent eos, Emathiam, Amphipolim, Maroneam, Aenum incolumes esse. Apud se templa omnibus ornamentis spoliata; compilataque sacrilegiis[3] C. Lucretium navibus Antium devexisse; libera corpora in[4] servitutem abrepta; fortunas sociorum populi Romani direptas esse et cotidie
11 diripi. Nam ex instituto C. Lucreti Hortensium quoque in tectis hieme pariter atque aestate navalis socios habere, et domos suas plenas turba nautica esse; versari inter se, coniuges liberosque suos, quibus nihil neque dicere pensi sit neque facere.[5]

[1] superbe, avare, crudeliter fecisset Fr: superaverecrudeliterfecisse V.

[2] quam fide decedant Kreyssig: quamsinedecedatur V: quam fide decedatur Weissenborn.

[3] spoliata; compilataque sacrilegiis Weissenborn: conpilataspoliataquesacrilegiis V: conpilata spoliaque sacrilegis Gitlbauer, rec. Giarratano; spoliata conpilataque; spolia sacrilegis Zingerle; alia alii.

[4] libera corpora in Fr: liberacorporaliberatain V.

[5] sit neque facere Sigonius: sinequefacere V.

with to bewail the disasters of his fatherland, he set B.C. 170 forth, first, the good services of his state, both in earlier times and those which, during the war with Perseus, they had performed for the Roman commanders and armies, and next the acts of arrogance, greed, and cruelty which in the first instance had been committed against Micythion's fellow-countrymen by Gaius Lucretius the Roman praetor, and, furthermore, were being committed more than ever at that time by Lucius Hortensius. Just as they considered that, rather than depart from their loyalty, they should suffer everything, even more grievous injuries than those which they were now suffering, so also, as far as Lucretius and Hortensius were concerned, they were aware that it would have been safer to bar their gates than to receive those Romans into their city. Those cities which had shut them out—Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, Aenus [1] —were unharmed. In Chalcis, temples had been stripped of all their adornments and the loot of these profanations Gaius Lucretius had transported in his ships to Antium; free persons had been rushed away to slavery; the possessions of allies of the Roman people had been plundered and daily were being plundered. For, according to the precedent set by Gaius Lucretius, Hortensius too was quartering his sailors, in summer no less than in winter, in private houses, and the homes of Chalcis were full of the mob from the fleet; at large among the Chalcideans and their wives and their children there were men utterly reckless in word and deed.

[1] The approach to these cities seems to have been during a naval raid like that of Marcius, XLIV. x.

A.U.C. 584

VIII. Accersere in senatum Lucretium placuit, ut disceptaret coram purgaretque sese. Ceterum multo plura praesens audivit, quam in absentem iacta erant: et graviores potentioresque accessere accusatores duo tribuni plebis, M'.[1] Iuventius Talna et Cn. Aufidius. Ii non in senatu modo eum lacerarunt, sed in contionem etiam pertracto multis obiectis probis diem dixerunt. Senatus iussu Chalcidensibus Q. Maenius praetor respondit, quae bene meritos sese et ante et in eo bello quod geratur de populo Romano dicant, ea et scire vera eos referre senatum et perinde ac debeant grata[2] esse. Quae facta a[3] C. Lucretio fierique ab L.[4] Hortensio praetoribus Romanis querantur, ea neque facta neque fieri voluntate[5] senatus quem non posse existimare, qui sciat bellum Persei et ante Philippo, patri[6] eius, intulisse populum Romanum pro libertate Graeciae, non ut ea a magistratibus suis socii atque amici[7] paterentur? Litteras se ad L. Hortensium praetorem daturos esse, quae Chalcidenses querantur acta, ea senatui non placere: si qui in servitutem liberi venissent, ut eos conquirendos[8] primo quoque

[1] tribuni plebis, M' Sigonius: tr̃. pl. m. V.
[2] grata Fr: gratia V.
[3] a add. Fr: om. V.
[4] L. Fr: lucretio V.
[5] fieri voluntate Fr: fievoluntatates V.
[6] patri Fr: patria V.
[7] magistratibus suis socii atque amici J. F. Gronovius et Duker, qui suis addidit, et ponens: magistratibusutsociatqueamici V: a magistratibus sociis et amicis Fr.
[8] eos conquirendos primo quoque tempore Fr: eosconprimoquoquetempore V.

VIII. It was voted to summon Lucretius before B.C. 170 the senate in order that he might plead in person and attempt to clear himself. However, when he appeared he heard many more reproaches than had been hurled at him in his absence; and more influential and powerful accusers joined in, namely, two tribunes of the people, Manius Iuventius Talna and Gnaeus Aufidius. These not only assailed him in the senate, but also dragged him before an assembly, and after casting many reproaches at him, then set a day for his trial. By order of the senate Quintus Maenius the praetor replied to the envoys of Chalcis that, as to the services to the Roman People, both previously and in the war now being waged, which the envoys mentioned, the senate knew that they had spoken truly and, also, these services were appreciated exactly as they should be. As to their complaints about what the Roman praetor Gaius Lucretius had done, and what Lucius Hortensius the Roman praetor was doing, no one could be unaware that these things had been done and were being done without the consent of the senate,—no one, that is, who knew that the Roman People had declared war on Perseus and previously on Philip, his father, to preserve the freedom of Greece,[1] and not to inflict on allies and friends such injuries from Roman officers. His fellow-senators, said Maenius, would send a letter to the praetor Lucius Hortensius, saying that the senate was displeased with those actions of which the people of Chalcis complained; that if any free persons had been sold into slavery, he should take steps at the first possible moment to search them out

[1] The slogan for Roman intervention to the eastward, cf. XXXIV. lviii. 11–12, XXXVII. liv. 17.

A.U.C. 584

tempore restituendosque in libertatem curaret; sociorum navalium neminem praeter magistros in 8 hospitia deduci aequum censere. Haec Hortensio iussu senatus scripta. Munera binum milium aeris legatis missa et vehicula Micythioni [1] publice locata, 9 quae eum Brundisium commode perveherent. C. Lucretium, ubi dies quae dicta erat venit, tribuni ad populum accusarunt multamque deciens centum 10 milium aeris dixerunt. Comitiis habitis omnes quinque et triginta tribus eum condemnarunt.

IX. In Liguribus eo anno [2] nihil memorabile gestum. Nam nec hostes moverunt arma, neque 2 consul in agrum eorum legiones induxit; et satis explorata pace eius anni milites duarum legionum Romanarum intra dies sexaginta, quam in provin- 3 ciam venit, dimisit. Sociorum nominis Latini exercitu mature in hiberna Lunam et Pisas deducto ipse cum equitibus Galliae provinciae pleraque oppida adiit.

4 Nusquam alibi quam in Macedonia bellum erat. Suspectum tamen [3] Gentium, Illyriorum regem, 5 habebant. Itaque et octo navis ornatas a Brundisio senatus censuit mittendas ad C. Furium legatum

[1] Micythioni Bekker: micioni V.
[2] anno add. Fr: om. V.
[3] tamen Hartel: tā et V: tamen et Fr.

---

[1] In the comitia tributa; a few more details in the account of the similar trial, below, xvi. 11–16.

[2] Probably on furlough, subject to further call; the consul would not have formally discharged the army without action by the senate.

[3] Gentius had been suspected of piracy in 180 B.C. (XL. xlii. 2–5, XLII. xxix. 11). Efforts to attach him to the Roman and restore them to freedom; that the senate B.C. 170 deemed it just that none of the sailors, except the captains, should be quartered in private houses. These instructions were by order of the senate written to Hortensius. Gifts of two thousand asses apiece were sent to the envoys, and carriages were hired at public expense for Micythion, to convey him comfortably to Brundisium. As for Gaius Lucretius, on the day set for his trial, the tribunes accused him before the people [1] and proposed a fine of one million asses. When the vote was taken, all the thirty-five tribes approved his condemnation.

IX. Among the Ligurians nothing noteworthy was accomplished that year. For neither did the enemy take up arms, nor did the consul lead his legions into enemy territory; and having sufficiently assured himself of peace for that year, he sent home [2] the soldiers of the two Roman legions within sixty days after arriving in his province. After having at an early time led the force of allies of the Latin Name into winter-quarters at Luna and Pisa, he himself visited with the cavalry several towns of the province of Gaul.

Nowhere else was there war except in Macedonia. However, they still regarded Gentius, the king of the Illyrians,[3] with suspicion. And so, on the one hand, the senate decided that eight fully-equipped ships should be sent from Brundisium to Gaius Furius,[4] the staff-officer at Issa, who was in charge of cause had been misconducted and were valueless (XLII. xxxvii. 2, and xlv. 8). On Perseus' overtures to Gentius, see below, xix. 13–xx. 3, and xxiii. 8.

[4] Very likely the naval duumvir mentioned in XLI. i. 2–3, who had been in charge of the north-eastern coast of Italy in 178 B.C.

A.U.C. 584

Issam, qui cum praesidio duarum Issensium navium
6 insulae praeerat—duo milia [1] militum in eas naves sunt imposita, quae M. Raecius praetor ex senatus consulto [2] in ea parte Italiae, quae obiecta Illyrico est, conscripsit —, et consul Hostilius Ap. Claudium in Illyricum cum [3] quattuor milibus peditum misit, ut
7 accolas Illyrici tutaretur.[4] Qui non contentus iis quas adduxerat copiis auxilia ab sociis conrogando ad octo milia hominum ex [5] vario genere armavit peragrataque omni ea regione ad Lychnidum [6] Dassaretiorum consedit.

X. Haud procul inde Uscana oppidum finium imperiique [7] Persei erat. Decem milia civium habebat et modicum custodiae causa Cretensium praesidium.
2 Inde nuntii ad Claudium occulti veniebant, si propius copias admovisset, paratos fore, qui proderent urbem. Et operae pretium esse : non se amicosque tantum,
3 sed etiam milites praeda expleturum. Spes cupiditati [8] admota ita occaecavit animum, ut nec ex

[1] praeerat—duo milia Fr : praecrantmiseruntduomilia V : post praeerat lacunam statuit Weissenborn.
[2] imposita, quae M. Raecius praetor ex senatus consulto Kreyssig : inpositaq. imreciuspr̃. exsc̃ V.
[3] cum add. Fr : om. V.
[4] Illyrici tutaretur I. Perizonius : inlyricitutarentur V.
[5] ex add. Madvig : om. V.
[6] Lychnidum Sigonius : lycidinum V.
[7] finium imperiique Harant : finium plerique V : finitimum imperio Weissenborn : finium plerumque Fr.
[8] Spes cupiditati Fr : specupiditatis V.

[1] The number of soldiers to be transported on the ships, which had their own crews, seems too large (cf. XXXVII. ii. 10—a force of three thousand transported in twenty ships (cf. XXII. xxii. 1), XXI. i. 5—1700 soldiers and sailors in 7 ships) and the number of ships should perhaps be larger (eighteen ?).

the island with a force of two Issaean ships—two thousand soldiers were put aboard the eight [1] ships, a force raised, in accordance with a decree of the senate, by Marcus Raecius [2] the praetor, in that part of Italy which faced Illyricum—and, on the other hand, the consul Hostilius sent Appius Claudius into Illyricum with four thousand infantry, to protect the peoples bordering on Illyricum. Claudius, being unsatisfied with the force that he had brought, by collecting auxiliaries from the allies brought under arms about eight thousand men of various sorts, and after traversing all that region took up his position at Lychnidus of the Dassaretii.[3] B.C. 170

X. Not far from there lay Uscana, a town belonging to the lands and realm of Perseus.[4] It had ten thousand inhabitants and a moderate garrison of Cretans to protect it. From there, secret messengers kept coming to Claudius, declaring that if he would bring his troops up closer, there were those who were ready to betray the city. And it would be worth his while, they added, for he would not only satisfy himself and his friends, but also his soldiers with the booty. Hope joined to greed so blinded his mind

[2] The city praetor, cf. below, xi. 4; he was evidently absent from Rome on coast-defence duty, hence the appearance of Maenius (above, iv. 11, and viii. 4) as presiding officer of the senate.

[3] Garrisons had been placed in their territory the preceding year, XLII. xxxvi. 9.

[4] But below, xviii. 5–xxi. 1, Livy relates, presumably after Polybius, that Uscana was held by a Roman garrison until captured by Perseus, and that Lucius Coelius led an abortive attempt to recover it. There seems to be a duplication of the story here, of which Livy is unaware; the account here given presumably comes from a Roman source.

A.U.C. 584

iis qui [1] venerant [2] quemquam retineret nec obsides, pignus futuros afore fraudem [3] agendae rei, posceret nec mitteret exploratum nec fidem acciperet. Die tantum statuta profectus a Lychnido duodecim milia
4 ab urbe ad quam tendebat posuit castra. Quarta inde vigilia signa movit mille ferme ad praesidium castrorum relictus. Incompositi, longo agmine effusi, infrequentes, cum nocturnus error dissiparet, ad
5 urbem pervenerunt. Crevit neglegentia postquam neminem armatum in muris viderunt. Ceterum, ubi primum sub ictu [4] teli fuerunt, duabus simul portis erumpitur; et ad clamorem erumpentium ingens strepitus e muris [5] ortus ululantium mulierum cum crepitu undique aeris, et incondita multitudo turba
6 inmixta servili variis vocibus personabat. Hic tam multiplex undique obiectus terror effecit, ne sustinere primam procellam eruptionis Romani possent. Itaque fugientes plures quam pugnantes interempti sunt; vix duo milia hominum cum ipso
7 legato in castra perfugerunt. Quo longius iter in castra erat, eo pluris fessos consectandi hostibus copia
8 fuit. Ne moratus quidem in castris Appius, ut suos dissipatos fuga colligeret, quae res palatis per agros saluti fuisset, ad Lychnidum protinus reliquias cladis reduxit.

[1] ut nec ex iis qui Fr: necutisqui V.
[2] venerant J. F. Gronovius: venerunt V.
[3] afore fraudem Bekker: aforoetfraudem V.
[4] ictu Drakenborch: iectu V: iactu Fr.
[5] strepitus e muris Fr: strepitusqueemuris V: strepitus tumultusque e muris H. J. Müller.

that neither did he keep with him any of the messen- B.C. 170 gers who had come, nor did he demand hostages as security that there would be no treachery in the carrying out of the plan, nor did he send men to reconnoitre, nor did he receive any solemn promise. Having merely agreed upon a day, he set out from Lychnidus and pitched camp twelve miles from the city to which he was marching. Thence in the fourth watch he began to advance, leaving about a thousand to garrison the camp. The soldiers arrived near the city in disorder, scattered in a long column, and straggling, since wandering by night had dispersed them. Their carelessness increased after they saw no armed man on the walls. However, as soon as they were within range of missiles, a sally was made from two gates at once; and together with the battle-cry of the sallying parties, there arose from the walls a great uproar of women howling and of bronze clashing everywhere, while an unorganized crowd, with disorderly bands of slaves amongst them, clamoured with various outcries. This appalling surprise, presented from all directions in so many forms, brought it about that the Romans could not withstand the first storm-blast of the sally. And so more were slaughtered in the flight than in the combat; hardly two thousand men, together with the commander himself, escaped to the camp. Since the way to the camp was long, the enemy had the opportunity to overtake more of the weary men. Appius, not even lingering in camp to gather his men scattered in flight—an action which would have been the means of saving those who were wandering through the countryside—at once led back to Lychnidus the remnants of the disaster.

A.U.C. 584

XI. Haec et alia haud prospere in Macedonia gesta ex Sex. Digitio tribuno militum, qui sacrificii [1] causa Romam venerat, sunt audita. Propter quae veriti patres ne qua maior [2] ignominia acciperetur legatos in Macedoniam M. Fulvium [3] Flaccum et M. Caninium Rebilum miserunt, qui comperta [4] quae agerentur referrent; et ut A. Atilius consul comitia consulibus rogandis ita ediceret, uti mense Ianuario confici [5] possent, et ut primo quoque tempore in urbem rediret. Interim M. Raecio praetori mandatum, ut edicto senatores omnes ex tota Italia, nisi qui rei publicae causa abessent, Romam revocaret: qui Romae essent, ne quis ultra mille passuum ab Roma abesset. Ea, uti senatus censuit, sunt facta. Comitia consularia ante diem quintum [6] kal. Febr.[7] fuere. Creati consules sunt Q. Marcius Philippus iterum et Cn.[8] Servilius Caepio. Post diem tertium praetores sunt facti C.[9] Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Sulpicius Gallus, C. Marcius Figulus, Ser.[10] Cornelius Lentulus, P. Fonteius Capito. Designatis praetoribus praeter duas urbanas quattuor

[1] ex Sex. Digitio tribuno militum qui sacrificii Fr: exdigitiosextopr̄. miliaquisacrificiis V.
[2] ne qua maior A. Perizonius: nequemaior V: ne quae maior Fr.
[3] Fulvium *Fr*²: Furium V.
[4] qui comperta Fr: quaecumconperta V.
[5] confici Madvig: comitia V: comitia haberi Fr.
[6] ante diem quintum Sigonius: ad. u V.
[7] Febr. Pighius: sep. V.
[8] Cn. Sigonius: q. V.
[9] C. Sigonius: m. V.
[10] Ser. *Fr*²: serg. V.

[1] A similar, but even stricter, emergency measure is recorded in XXXVI. iii. 3 (191 B.C.), just before the campaigns against Antiochus.
[2] His previous consulship was in 186 B.C., cf. XXXIX. viii

XI. This and other affairs in Macedonia conducted B.C. 170 with no success were reported by Sextus Digitius, a tribune of the soldiers, who had come to Rome to offer a sacrifice. The result was that the Fathers, solicitous lest some greater disgrace might befall, sent as commissioners to Macedonia Marcus Fulvius Flaccus and Marcus Caninius Rebilus, who were to report after investigation on what was taking place; the Fathers also decided that Aulus Atilius the consul should proclaim the assembly for the election of consuls for such a time that it might be completed during the month of January, and that he should return to the city at the first possible moment. Meanwhile Marcus Raecius the praetor was charged with recalling to Rome by proclamation all senators from the whole of Italy, except those who were absent on public business, while those who were in Rome were not to go more than a mile away from Rome.[1] These matters were carried out as the senate voted. The consular elections were held on the twenty-sixth of January. The consuls elected were Quintus Marcius Philippus for the second time [2] and Gnaeus Servilius Caepio. Two days later there were elected as praetors Gaius Decimius, Marcus Claudius Marcellus.[3] Gaius Sulpicius Gallus, Gaius Marcius Figulus, Servius Cornelius Lentulus, Publius Fonteius Capito. For the praetors-elect four assign-ff.; he had been envoy to Greece and to Perseus just before the outbreak of the war, XLII. xxxviii–xlvii.

[3] He was tribune in 171 B.C. (XLII. xxxii. 7), going out of office on December 9th of that year; the interval of a year and three months was apparently regularly regarded as fulfilling the requirement of two years which, according to the Lex Villia Annalis (XL. xliv. 1), cf. Cicero, Philippics 5, 17, de Legibus 3, 3, had to elapse between two terms in office.

A.U.C. 584

provinciae sunt decretae : Hispania et Sardinia et Sicilia et classis.

9 Legati ex Macedonia exacto admodum mense Februario redierunt. Hi quas res ea aestate prospere gessisset rex Perseus referebant, quantusque timor socios populi Romani cepisset tot urbibus in potes-
10 tatem regis redactis. Exercitum consulis infrequentem commeatibus vulgo datis per ambitionem esse : culpam eius rei consulem in tribunos militum,
11 contra illos in consulem [1] conferre. Ignominiam Claudi temeritate acceptam elevare eos patres acceperunt,[2] qui perpaucos Italici generis et magna ex parte [3] tumultuario dilectu conscriptos ibi milites
12 amissos referebant. Consules designati ubi primum magistratum inissent, de Macedonia referre ad senatum iussi ; destinataeque provinciae iis sunt Italia et Macedonia.

13 Hoc anno intercalatum est : tertio die post Terminalia kalendae intercalariae [4] fuere. Sacerdotes intra eum annum mortui sunt [5] L. Flamininus . . .[6] pontifices duo decesserunt, L. Furius Philus et C.

[1] intribunosmilitumcontraillosinconsulem bis V.

[2] Displicet acceperunt editoribus ; itaque perceperunt proposuit Brakman, accusaverunt, quia, Hartel : laeti acceperunt quippe, Weissenborn : elevare eo patres acceperunt, quod Madvig.

[3] ex parte add. Fr : om. V.

[4] intercalariae Weissenborn : intercalaria V : intercalares Fr.

[5] mortui sunt Hertz et Wesenberg : mortuus est V : mortui Fr : inter sacerdotes eo anno mortuus est L. T. Gronovius.

[6] Flamininus Sigonius, augur ex XXV. ii. 2 addens : Flaminius V : Crévier et Duker etiam nomen successoris excidisse putaverunt.

[1] The text is uncertain here ; other interpretations proposed by scholars include, "The Fathers accused the commissioners

ments besides the two in the city were decreed : Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and the fleet. B.C. 170

The commissioners from Macedonia returned when the month of February was just ended. These reported the successes achieved by King Perseus during that summer, and how great a panic had seized the allies of the Roman people when so many cities were brought under the control of the king. The army of the consul, said the commissioners, was reduced in numbers because leaves of absence had been lavishly granted as a means of currying political favour; blame for this situation was placed by the consul on the tribunes of the soldiers, but by them, on the other hand, on the consul. The Fathers took it that[1] the commissioners were minimizing the disgrace inflicted by the rashness of Claudius, since they reported that very few soldiers of Italian stock, but chiefly those enrolled on the spot in an irregular levy, had been lost. The consuls-elect were ordered to present to the senate, as soon as they entered upon their office, the problem of Macedonia; and Italy and Macedonia were designated as their provinces.

In this year there was an intercalation; the additional month began on the third day after the Terminalia.[2] There died of the priests in that year Lucius Flamininus . . .[3] two pontiffs passed away, Lucius Furius Philus and Gaius Livius Salinator.

of minimizing . . . because they reported," and, "The Fathers were glad to hear the commissioners minimize . . ." (see critical note).

[2] See appendix following this Book, pp. 87–88.

[3] The priesthood held by Flamininus and the name of his successor are missing; he was probably the augur elected in 213 B.C., XXV. ii. 2.

A.U.C. 584 Livius Salinator. In locum Furii T. Manlium Torquatum, in Livi M. Servilium pontifices legerunt.

A.U.C. 585 XII. Principio insequentis anni cum consules novi Q. Marcius et Cn.[1] Servilius de provinciis rettulissent, primo quoque tempore aut comparare eos inter se 2 Italiam et Macedoniam aut sortiri placuit; priusquam id sors cerneret,[2] in incertum, ne quid gratia momenti faceret, in utramque provinciam quod res desideraret 3 supplementi decerni[3] — in Macedoniam peditum Romanorum sex milia, sociorum nominis Latini sex milia, equites Romanos ducentos quinquaginta, socios 4 trecentos — veteres milites dimitti, ita ut in singulas Romanas legiones ne plus sena milia peditum, 5 treceni equites essent. Alteri consuli nullus[4] certus[5] finitus numerus civium Romanorum quem in supplementum legeret. Id modo finitum, ut duas legiones scriberet, quae quina milia peditum et ducenos[6] 6 haberent, equites trecenos. Latinorum maior quam collegae decretus numerus, peditum[7] decem milia et sescenti equites. Quattuor praeterea legiones scribi iussae, quae si quo opus esset educerentur. 7 Tribunos iis non permissum ut consules facerent: populus creavit. Sociis nominis Latini sedecim milia

[1] Cn. Sigonius: q. V.
[2] cerneret Fr: cernens V.
[3] post decerni—decreverunt add. Madvig, decernunt H. J. Müller.
[4] nullus Fr: nulli V.
[5] certus ut glossema delere vult Warmington, homoeoteleuta spernens.
[6] ducenos Fr: ducentenos V.
[7] peditum J. F. Gronovius: peditum Latinorum V.

[1] Probably a praetor of this year.
[2] Below, XLIV. i. 1, the figure of 5000 (perhaps incomplete) is given, presumably following Polybius. The figures here principal temples and that the people should wear wreaths.[1] Everything was carried out as the Board of Ten prescribed. B.C. 169

XIV. Thereupon the assembly for electing censors was announced. The leading men of the state sought the censorship, Gaius Valerius Laevinus, Lucius Postumius Albinus, Publius Mucius Scaevola, Marcus Junius Brutus, Gaius Claudius Pulcher, Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus. The last two were elected censors by the Roman people. Since concern over holding the levy was greater, because of the Macedonian war, than at other times, the consuls blamed the commons before the senate because even [2] the men of military age were not presenting themselves. Retorting to them Gaius Sulpicius and Marcus Claudius the praetors pleaded the cause of the commons; the levy, they said, was difficult, not for consuls, but for politically-minded consuls; they never enrolled a soldier against his will. That the Conscript Fathers might also be sure that this was so, they themselves, though praetors, whose powers of office and importance were less, would, if it seemed best to the senate, complete the levy.[3] This task was entrusted to the praetors with great enthusiasm on the part of the Fathers, not without jeers at the consuls. The censors, to further the business, made the following proclamation before a meeting; that they were going to lay down a rule for taking the the Macedonian campaign, older men (the seniores, 47–60 years old) also were drafted or volunteered, cf. XLII. xxxi. 4 and xxxii. 6.

[3] Conduct of a levy by praetors when the consuls were otherwise occupied was not without precedent, cf. XXXIX. xx. 4, xxxviii. 10; XLII. xviii. 6; but the supplanting of the consuls was peculiar to this occasion.

A.U.C. 585

dicturos esse, ut praeter commune omnium civium 6 ius iurandum haec adiurarent : " tu minor annis sex et quadraginta es tuque [1] ex edicto C. Claudi Ti.
Semproni censorum ad dilectum prodisti [2] et quoti-enscumque dilectus erit quoad [3] hi censores magistratum habebunt, si miles factus non eris, in dilec-7 tum [4] prodibis [5] ? " item, quia fama erat multos ex Macedonicis legionibus incertis commeatibus per ambitionem imperatorum ab exercitu abesse, edixerunt de militibus P. Aelio C. Popilio [6] consulibus 8 postve eos consules in Macedoniam scriptis, ut qui eorum in [7] Italia essent intra dies triginta, censi [8] prius apud sese, in provinciam redirent; qui in patris aut avi potestate essent, eorum nomina ad se ederen-9 tur.[9] Missorum quoque causas sese cognituros esse; et quorum ante emerita stipendia gratiosa 10 missio sibi visa esset, eos milites fieri iussuros. Hoc edicto litterisque censorum per fora et conciliabula dimissis tanta multitudo iuniorum Romam convenit, ut gravis urbi turba insolita esset.

[1] es tuque Fr : estusque V.
[2] prodisti Madvig : proditi V : prodito Fr : prodibis Duker.
[3] quoad Harant : quae V : quamdiu Weissenborn : cum Madvig post Ursinum : quando Goldbacher.
[4] delectum (sic) Sigonius : dilectu V.
[5] prodibis Fr : providebis V.
[6] C. Popilio add. Fr : om. V.
[7] eorum in Fr : eorumquiin V.
[8] censi Fr : cons. V.
[9] nomina ad se ederentur Fr : nomine adsederentur V.

[1] Either for a year and a half, during which the censors were allowed to be active, by the Aemilian law (434 B.C., IV. xxiv. 5, cf. IX. xxxiii. 3 ff.), or for three years, as the censors' authority over construction and repairs was, according to XLV. xv. 9, customarily continued for a second period of census that, besides the general oath for all citizens, B.C. 169 they would require assent on oath to the following: "Are you less than forty-six years of age, and have you, in accordance with the proclamation of Gaius Claudius and Tiberius Sempronius the censors, come forward for the levy, and as often as there shall be a levy, as long as these censors shall hold office,[1] if you have not entered the army, will you come forward for the levy?"; again, since it was rumoured that many were absent on leave from the legions in Macedonia without specific reason because of the popularity-hunting of the generals, they proclaimed concerning the soldiers enrolled for Macedonia in the consulship of Publius Aelius and Gaius Popilius [2] or after that consulship, that whoever of them were in Italy should within thirty days, having first appeared before the censors, return to their province, and that the names of those who were subject to the authority of father or grandfather [3] should be reported to the censors. They would also review, they said, the reasons for discharges, and those whose discharge before completion of their military service seemed to the censors to result from indulgence they would order to be enrolled as soldiers. Through this proclamation of the censors, and through their letters sent about throughout the markets and hamlets, so large a crowd of men of military age assembled at Rome that the unusual throng was burdensome to the city.

equal length; hardly for the full five years till other censors were chosen.

[2] 172 B.C.; a small force crossed over to the towns of the west coast in that year, cf. XLII. xxvii.

[3] Such men would not appear before the censors, as their property belonged to the estate of their controlling relative.

A.U.C. 585

XV. Praeter dilectum eorum quos in supplementum mitti oportebat quattuor a C. Sulpicio praetore scriptae legiones sunt, intraque undecim
2 dies dilectus est perfectus. Consules deinde sortiti provincias sunt. Nam praetores propter iurisdic-
3 tionem maturius sortiti erant. Urbana C. Sulpicio, peregrina C. Decimio obtigerat; Hispaniam M. Claudius Marcellus, Siciliam Ser. Cornelius Lentulus, Sardiniam P. Fonteius Capito, classem C. Marcius Figulus erat sortitus. Consulum Cn. Servilio Italia, Q. Marcio Macedonia obvenit; Latinisque actis
4 Marcius extemplo est profectus. Caepione deinde referente ad senatum, quas ex novis legionibus duas legiones secum in Galliam duceret, decrevere patres ut C. Sulpicius M. Claudius praetores ex iis quas scripsissent legionibus quas videretur consuli darent.
5 Indigne patiens [1] praetorum arbitrio consulem subiectum, dimisso senatu [2] ad tribunal praetorum stans postulavit, ex senatus consulto destinarent sibi duas legiones. Praetores consulis in eligendo [3] arbitrium fecerunt.
6 Senatum deinde censores legerunt: M. Aemilius Lepidus princeps ab tertiis iam censoribus lectus,
7 Septem de senatu eiecti sunt.[4] In censu accipiendo populi milites ex Macedonico exercitu, qui quam multi abessent ab signis census docuit, in provinciam

[1] patiens J. F. Gronovius: patiente V.
[2] subiectum, dimisso senatu Fr: subdectumdemissosenon V.
[3] consulis in eligendo J. F. Gronovius: consulinelegando V.
[4] lectus. Septem de senatu eiecti sunt Novák: lectuseptemensenatuelectisunt V: e senatu Fr.

[1] His previous elections are recorded in XL. li. 1 and XLI. xxvii. 1.

XV. Besides the levy of those who were needed B.C. 169 to be sent as reinforcements four legions were enrolled by Gaius Sulpicius the praetor, and within eleven days the levy was completed. The consuls then drew lots for their provinces. For the praetors had drawn lots more promptly to secure the administration of justice. The city praetorship fell to Gaius Sulpicius, the jurisdiction over aliens to Gaius Decimius; Spain was drawn by Marcus Claudius Marcellus, Sicily by Servius Cornelius Lentulus, Sardinia by Publius Fonteius Capito, the fleet by Gaius Marcius Figulus. Of the consuls, Italy fell to Gnaeus Servilius, and Macedonia to Quintus Marcius; when the Latin Festival had been held, Marcius at once set out. When Caepio then consulted the senate as to which two of the new legions he should take with him to Gaul, the Fathers voted that Gaius Sulpicius and Marcus Claudius the praetors should give the consul what legions they chose from those they had enrolled. Feeling insulted that a consul should be subject to the decision of praetors, Servilius dismissed the senate and, taking his stand at the judgment-seat of the praetors, demanded that, in accordance with the decree of the senate, they assign him two legions. The praetors gave the consul his choice in the selection.

Thereupon the censors chose the senate; Marcus Aemilius Lepidus was chosen chief. This was the third time the censors had chosen him.[1] Seven were expelled from the senate. In receiving the census of the people they forced the soldiers from the army in Macedonia—the census showed how numerous were these absentees from the ranks—to

A.U.C. 585

8 redire [1] cogebant; causas de [2] stipendiis missorum cognoscebant, et cuius nondum iusta missio visa esset, ita iusiurandum adigebant: "ex tui animi sententia, tu ex edicto C. Claudi Ti. Semproni censorum [3] in provinciam Macedoniam redibis, quod sine dolo malo facere poteris?"

XVI. In equitibus recensendis tristis admodum eorum atque aspera censura fuit: multis equos 2 ademerunt. In ea re cum equestrem ordinem offendissent, flammam invidiae adiecere edicto, quo edixerunt, ne quis eorum qui Q. Fulvio A. Postumio censoribus publica vectigalia aut ultro tributa conduxissent ad hastam suam accederet sociusve aut 3 adfinis eius conditionis esset. Saepe id querendo veteres publicani cum impetrare nequissent ab senatu ut modum potestati censoriae imponerent, tandem tribunum plebis P. Rutilium,[4] ex rei privatae contentione iratum censoribus, patronum causae nancti 4 sunt. Clientem eius [5] libertinum parietem in Sacra via adversus aedes publicas demoliri iusserant, quod 5 publico inaedificatus esset. Appellati a privato tribuni. Cum praeter Rutilium nemo intercederet,

[1] redire add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[2] de add. Hartel: om. V.
[3] censorum Fr: cēsoriam V.
[4] tribunum plebis P. Rutilium Sigonius: tr̄. pl. utilium V.
[5] eius add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.

[1] The previous censors, XLI. xxvii.
[2] Literally, "to their spear," since a spear was the sign of an auction; at the censors' auction contracts for public works return to their province; they reviewed the excuses B.C. 169 of those discharged from service, and in the case of any whose discharge seemed premature they compelled assent on oath to the following: "With your whole heart will you, in accordance with the decree of Gaius Claudius and Tiberius Sempronius the censors, return to the province of Macedonia, as you are able, in all sincerity, to do this?"

XVI. In reviewing the knights, the censorship of these officials was rather stern and harsh; they deprived many of their horses. When in this matter they had offended the order of knights, they added fire to the grudge by a proclamation, in which they proclaimed that none of those who in the censorship of Quintus Fulvius and Aulus Postumius [1] had farmed the public revenues or the public works should appear at the auction of Claudius and Sempronius,[2] or should be a partner or sharer in the contracting. When, after many complaints about this decree, the veteran tax-gatherers were unable to induce the senate to set a limit to the censors' power,[3] at last in a tribune of the people, Publius Rutilius, who was angry with the censors over a dispute concerning a private matter, they found an advocate for their cause. A freedman client of Rutilius had been ordered by the censors to pull down a house-wall on the Sacred Way opposite the public temples, because the wall was built on state land. An appeal was made by the citizen to the tribunes. When no one but Rutilius intervened in his behalf, the censors and for collecting the revenues were to be made, cf. XXXIX. xliv. 8 and the note.

[3] Compare the Pyrrhic victory of the contractors in 184 B.C., XXXIX. xliv. 8.

A.U.C. 585

censores ad pignera capienda miserunt multamque 6 pro contione privato dixerunt. Hinc [1] contentione orta cum veteres publicani se ad tribunum contulissent, rogatio repente sub unius tribuni nomine 7 promulgatur, quae publica vectigalia aut [2] ultro tributa C. Claudius et Ti. Sempronius locassent, ea rata locatio ne esset: ab integro locarentur et ut omnibus redimendi et conducendi promiscue ius 8 esset. Diem ad eius rogationem [3] concilio tribunus plebis dixit. Qui postquam venit [4] ut censores ad dissuadendum processerunt, Graccho dicente [5] silentium fuit; cum [6] Claudio obstreperetur, audi-9 entiam facere praeconem iussit. Eo facto avocatam [7] a se contionem tribunus questus et in ordinem se coactum ex Capitolio, ubi erat concilium, abiit.
10 Postero die ingentis tumultus ciere. Ti. Gracchi primum bona consecravit quod in multa pignoribusque eius qui tribunum appellasset,[8] intercessioni

[1] Hinc Fr: hic V.
[2] aut add. Walch: om. V.
[3] ita V; non accipiunt edd., aut eius delentes, aut legis addentes.
[4] dixit. Qui postquam venit Fr: dixitq. postvenit V.
[5] dicente Fr: dicendo V.
[6] cum add. Fr: om. V.
[7] avocatam Fr: avocato V.
[8] qui tribunum appellasset Fr: quitribuniquitribununm-appellassent V.

[1] Such bonds, designed to secure the appearance for trial of a person charged with a crime, were secured, not directly from the defendant, but from bondsmen from among his friends. For this practice, cf. III. xiii. 8, XXV. iv. 8–10, XXXIX. xli. 7, and Summary XLVIII. Aulus Gellius, XVI. x. 8, mentions bondsmen as one of the obsolete legal forms abolished by the lex Aebutia (exact date unknown). After this time, bonds were posted by the defendant.

sent agents to secure bonds [1] and announced before B.C. 169
a meeting a fine for the citizen.[2] A dispute having arisen from this cause, when the veteran tax-gatherers had resorted to the tribune, a proposed law was suddenly published under the name of the one tribune, stating that whereas Gaius Claudius and Tiberius Sempronius had let certain public revenues and public works, the letting of these should be void; they should be let anew, and everyone without restriction should have the right of farming and contracting. The tribune of the people announced for the assembly [3] a day for voting on this proposal.[4] When this day came, as the censors came forward to advise against the law,[5] while Gracchus was speaking there was silence; when heckling greeted Claudius, he ordered the herald to bring the meeting to order. When this was done, the tribune, complaining that the meeting had been taken out of his hands and that he had been deprived of his authority, left the Capitol, where the assembly was. Next day he raised a great uproar. He first dedicated to the gods the property of Tiberius Gracchus because in the matter of the fine and the bonds imposed on one who had appealed to a tribune,

[2] The veto of one tribune sufficed to debar an action, but the censors apparently expected the other tribunes to suppress Rutilius, as had been done on various other occasions, cf. II. xliii. 4, IV. xlix. 6 and liii. 7, IX. xxxiv. 26, XXIV. xliii. 3, or that the senate would support them, cf. XXIX. xxxvii. 17.

[3] An Assembly of the Commons (concilium plebis).

[4] An attempt is made here to translate the MS. text, without the usual alterations (see critical note). I accept the suggestion of Duker that the phrase, if completed, would be ad eius rogationis rogationem, rogatio meaning (a) a bill or proposed law, (b) the process of putting it to a vote.

[5] In a meeting (contio) held before the voting assembly.

A.U.C. 585

11 non parendo se in ordinem coegisset; C. Claudio diem dixit, quod contionem ab se avocasset; et utrique censori perduellionem se iudicare pronuntiavit diemque comitiis a C. Sulpicio praetore urbano 12 petit. Non recusantibus censoribus, quominus[1] primo quoque tempore iudicium de se populus faceret, in ante diem octavum et septimum kal.
13 Octobres comitiis perduellionis dicta dies. Censores extemplo in atrium Libertatis escenderunt[2] et ibi obsignatis[3] tabellis publicis clausoque tabulario et dimissis servis publicis negarunt se prius quidquam publici negotii gesturos, quam iudicium populi de se
14 factum esset. Prior Claudius causam dixit; et cum ex duodecim centuriis equitum octo censorem condemnassent multaeque aliae primae classis, extemplo principes civitatis in conspectu populi anulis aureis

[1] quominus J. F. Gronovius: quiiminus V.
[2] Libertatis escenderunt Kreyssig: libertatescenderunt V.
[3] obsignatis Hertz: signatis V.

---

[1] Rutilius proceeds under the law mentioned in III. lv. 7, that one who injured a tribune should forfeit his head to Jupiter, and that his property should be sold at the temple of Ceres, Liber and Libera; the ceremony of dedicating the man and his property to the gods might be performed by a tribune, cf. Cicero, De Domo Sua 47 (123–5), but apparently had to be confirmed by action of the people. Livy's phrasing seems to make Rutilius arrange for two trials for Claudius, but we hear of only one (below, 14–16) and it seems probable that the trial for treason, based on the charges mentioned, was the one action which was to confirm the sentence already pronounced by the tribune; also this sentence was probably directed equally against both, though Gracchus is named

Gracchus had, by not obeying the tribune's inter- B.C. 169 position, deprived him of his authority; he set a day for the trial of Gaius Claudius on the charge of taking the meeting away from him; and he announced that he judged each censor guilty of treason, and asked of Gaius Sulpicius the city praetor a day for an assembly.[1] Since the censors did not object to having the people pass judgment on them at the first possible moment, the day for the assembly-trial for treason was set for the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of September.[2] The censors immediately mounted to the Hall of Liberty [3] and, having there sealed the public accounts and closed the account-room and sent away the public slaves, declared that they would transact no public business until the judgment of the people upon them had been passed. Claudius pleaded his cause first; and when of the twelve centuries of knights eight had condemned the censor, along with many other centuries of the first class, at once the leading men of the state, in the sight of the people, laid aside their gold rings and alone. For a trial of treason, the comitia centuriata was called, since a death-sentence was involved, not the comitia tributa, as above, viii. 9, cf. the note, nor the concilium plebis.

[2] A day for each defendant, see XXV. iv. 10.

[3] This appears to have been next to the Senate-house, and perhaps a sort of annex to it. A rebuilding of the atrium in 194 B.C. is mentioned in XXXIV. xliv. 5; hostages were kept there, according to XXV. vii. 12; archives for laws were maintained there (Festus 241); and the enrolment of freedmen in the city tribes took place there (XLV. xv. 5). The anniversary day of the sanctuary of Freedom was April thirteenth (Ovid, Fasti IV. 623). In the first century B.C., slaves were imprisoned there (Cicero, Pro Milone 59), and, following a plan of Julius Caesar's, Asinius Pollio founded there the first public library in Rome, with rich sculptural adornment (Ovid, Tristia III. 1. 71–2, Suetonius, Augustus 29).

A.U.C. 585

positis vestem mutarunt, ut supplices plebem circumirent. Maxime tamen sententiam vertisse dicitur Ti. Gracchus, quod, cum clamor undique plebis esset periculum Graccho non esse, conceptis verbis iuravit, si collega damnatus esset, non expectato de se iudicio comitem exilii eius futurum. Adeo tamen ad extremum spei venit [1] reus, ut octo centuriae ad damnationem defuerint. Absoluto Claudio tribunus plebis negavit se Gracchum [2] morari.

XVII. Eo anno postulantibus Aquileiensium legatis, ut numerus colonorum augeretur,[3] mille et quingentae familiae ex senatus consulto scriptae triumvirique, qui eas deducerent, missi sunt [4] T. Annius Luscus, P. Decius Subulo, M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Eodem anno C. Popilius et Cn. Octavius legati, qui in Graeciam missi erant, senatus consultum Thebis primum recitatum per omnes Peloponnesi urbes [5] circumtulerunt ne quis ullam rem in bellum magistratibus Romanis conferret praeterquam quod senatus censuisset. Hoc fiduciam in posterum

[1] venit Fr: veniret V.
[2] Gracchum Fr: Graccho V.
[3] ut numerus colonorum augeretur J. F. Gronovius: utnumerumcolonorumaugeret V: ut numerum colonorum augerent I. Perizonius.
[4] post missi sunt vacat spatio 9 litterarum (Giarratano).
[5] Peloponnesi urbes Fr: Peloponnensesuiurbes V.

[1] I.e., a dark toga; with it jewellery was not worn, and senators and magistrates did not wear the purple stripe on their togas of mourning.

[2] Except for the knights, among whom were the hostile tax-gatherers, the danger to Claudius obviously arose from his harsh and arbitrary behaviour; cf. his actions during his consulate in 177 B.C., XLI. x. 5–13.

[3] The later activities of these censors are told below, XLIV. xvi. and XLV. xv.

put on mourning,[1] in order to go about entreating B.C. 169
the commons. Chiefly, however, Tiberius Gracchus is said to have changed men's minds, because, although there was everywhere shouting from the commons that Gracchus was in no danger, he swore in formal terms that if his colleague were condemned he would not await the outcome of his own trial, but would accompany Claudius into exile.[2] None the less, so near did the defendant come to the last ray of hope that only eight centuries were lacking for condemnation. When Claudius had been acquitted, the tribune of the people said that he did not care about the case of Gracchus.[3]

XVII. In that year, at the request of envoys from Aquileia that the number of colonists be increased, fifteen hundred households were enrolled in accordance with a decree of the senate, and a board of three, Titus Annius Luscus, Publius Decius Subulo, and Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, were sent to lead the settlement.[4]

In the same year[5] Gaius Popilius and Gnaeus Octavius, the envoys who had been sent into Greece, first caused to be read at Thebes and then to be carried about to all the cities of the Peloponnese the decree of the senate that no one should contribute anything to Roman officers for the war except what the senate should have voted. This resolution had [4] The reinforcement was sent two years after it was requested, cf. above, i. 5–12. The sending of settlers may have been easier during the censors' activity, cf. XXXIX. xliv. 10.

[5] At this point Livy begins to draw on Polybius XXVIII. 3; but Polybius says that the envoys urged the Thebans to loyalty, and read the senate's resolution only in the Peloponnese.

A.U.C. 585

quoque praebuerat levatos se oneribusque[1] impensisque quibus, alia aliis imperantibus, exhauriebantur. Achaico concilio Aegii iis dato[2] benigne locuti auditique, egregia spe futuri status[3] fidissima gente relicta, in Aetoliam traiecerunt. Ibi nondum quidem seditio erat, sed omnia suspecta criminumque inter ipsos plena: ob quae[4] obsidibus postulatis neque exitu rei imposito in Acarnaniam inde profecti legati sunt. Thyrrei[5] concilium legatis Acarnanes dederunt. Ibi quoque inter factiones[6] erat certamen: quidam principum postulare ut praesidia in urbes suas inducerentur adversus amentiam eorum qui ad Macedonas gentem[7] trahebant; pars recusare ne quod bello captis et hostibus mos esset, id pacatae et sociae civitates ignominiae acciperent. Iusta deprecatio haec visa. Larisam ad Hostilium proconsulem — ab eo enim missi erant — legati redierunt. Octavium retinuit secum. Popilium cum mille ferme militibus in hiberna Ambraciam misit.

XVIII. Perseus principio hiemis egredi Macedoniae finibus non ausus,[8] ne qua in regnum vacuum inrumperent Romani, sub tempus brumae, cum

[1] -que del. Madvig.

[2] Aegii iis dato Ursinus et Weissenborn, cf. Polyb. XXVIII. 3. 10: argisagitato V.

[3] status Fr: statuis V.

[4] inter ipsos plena; ob quae Fr: interipsospleuaqueinteripsospleuaobquae V.

[5] Thyrrei Sigonius: typri V.

[6] inter factiones Fr: interfectiones V.

[7] Macedonas gentem J. F. Gronovius: macedonicamgentem V: Macedonas Acarnanicam gentem Weissenborn: Macedonicam sectam gentem Goldbacher.

[8] non ausus Fr: ne ausus V.

[1] Cf. Polybius XXVIII. 3. 7–10.

produced confidence for the future, too, that they B.C. 169 had been relieved of both burdens and outlays, by which, as one and another ordered various things, they were being drained dry. Before an Achaean council held for them at Aegium the Roman envoys both spoke and were heard with cordiality,[1] and leaving this most loyal people with extraordinary hope for their future position, they crossed to Aetolia. There no revolt indeed had as yet broken out, but every move was suspected and replete with the mutual recriminations of the Aetolians; having, because of these, called for the giving of hostages, but without bringing the trouble to an end,[2] the envoys set out thence for Acarnania. At Thyrreum the Acarnanians held a council for the envoys. There too a contest between factions was under way; some of the chief men demanded that garrisons be brought into their cities to guard against the madness of those who were dragging the tribe toward the Macedonians; some objected to this, on the ground that the disgrace which was customary for those captured in war and hostile should not be inflicted on peaceful and allied cities. This plea in opposition seemed sound.[3] The envoys returned to Hostilius the proconsul at Larisa—for they had been sent by him. Octavius he kept with him, Popilius he sent with about a thousand soldiers into winter quarters at Ambracia.

XVIII. Perseus did not dare to leave the limits of Macedonia at the outset of winter, for fear that at some point the Romans might raid his undefended realm. About the winter solstice, however, when

[2] Cf. Polybius XXVIII. 4.
[3] Cf. Polybius XXVIII. 5.

A.U.C. 585

inexsuperabilis [1] ab Thessalia montes nivis altitudo
2 facit, occasionem esse ratus frangendi finitimorum spes animosque, ne quid averso se [2] in Romanum bellum periculi ab iis esset [3] cum a Thracia pacem Cotys, ab Epiro Cephalus repentina defectione ab Romanis praestarent. Dardanos recens domuisset
3 bellum,[4] solum infestum esse Macedoniae latus quod ab Illyrico pateret cernens, neque ipsis quietis Illyriis et aditum praebentibus Romano [5] si domuisset proximos Illyriorum Gentium quoque regem iam diu dubium in societatem perlici posse, cum decem
4 milibus peditum. quorum pars phalangitae erant, et duobus milibus levium armorum [6] et quingentis
5 equitibus profectus Stuberram venit. Inde frumento complurium dierum sumpto iussoque apparatu oppugnandarum urbium sequi, tertio die ad Uscanam [7] — Penestianae terrae ea maxima [8] urbs est —
6 posuit castra,[9] prius tamen quam vim admoveret, missis qui temptarent nunc praefectorum praesidii, nunc oppidanorum animos. Erat autem ibi cum 7 iuventute Illyriorum Romanum praesidium.[10] Post-

[1] inexsuperabilis Fr: exsuperabilis V.
[2] averso se Fr: inadversose V.
[3] ab iis esset Forchhammer: abisset V.
[4] bellum Kreyssig: sedbellumi V: bello Fr.
[5] Romano J. F. Gronovius: Romanis V.
[6] armorum J. F. Gronovius: armatorum V.
[7] Uscanam Sigonius: Uscana V, et Graece neutrum est; at cf. infra xix. 1, etc.
[8] maxima Sigonius: maxime V.
[9] castra Fr: causa V. [10] praesidium Fr: r V.

[1] That is, the western passes, cf. XLII. liii. 6; Tempe was held by the Macedonian garrison at Gonnus, XLII. liv. 8; and cf. XLIV. ii.

[2] Livy's account of affairs in Epirus and the campaign against the Dardani is lost, cf. above, iii. 7 and the note. Con-

the depth of snow makes the mountains [1] impassable B.C. 169 from Thessaly, he thought that here was an opportunity to shatter the hopes and spirits of his neighbours, so that no danger might arise from them while his attention was turned toward the campaign against the Romans. On the side of Thrace Cotys assured peace, as did Cephalus on the side of Epirus [2] by his sudden desertion of the Romans, while the recent campaign had subdued the Dardani. Perceiving then that the only quarter hostile to Macedonia was that which allowed access from Illyricum, where the Illyrians themselves were restless and were providing the Romans with an approach, and that if he conquered the nearest Illyrians, he might also entice King Gentius, who had long been wavering, into an alliance, Perseus set out with ten thousand infantry, some of whom were phalanx-men,[3] two thousand light troops, and five hundred cavalry, and reached Stuberra. Thence, taking grain for a number of days and ordering equipment for besieging cities to follow, on the third day he pitched camp by Uscana [4] —which is the largest city of the Penestian region— but sent, before bringing an attack to bear, men to test the mood, now of the commanders of the garrison, now of the townspeople. For there was in the city, along with the young men of the Illyrians, a Roman garrison. After the messengers reported cerning the latter, Plutarch, Aemilius Paullus IX. 3, says that Perseus killed 10,000 Dardanians and acquired much booty.

[3] The rest were peltasts, cf. Perseus' muster-roll in XLII. li. 3–11.

[4] Cf. above, x. and the note, for a Roman counter-attack on this town, the account of which Livy has not harmonized with Polybius' account reproduced here.

A.U.C. 585

quam nihil pacati referebant oppugnare est adortus et corona eam capere conatus est.[1] Cum sine intermissione[2] interdiu noctuque alii aliis succedentes, pars scalas muris, pars[3] ignem portis inferrent, sustinebant tamen eam tempestatem propugnatores
8 urbis, quia spes erat neque hiemis vim diutius pati Macedonas in aperto posse, nec ab Romano bello tantum regi laxamenti fore ut posset morari.
9 Ceterum postquam vineas agi turresque excitari vident,[4] victa pertinacia est. Nam praeterquam quod adversus vim pares non erant, ne frumenti quidem aut ullius alterius rei copia intus erat, ut in 10 necopinata obsidione. Itaque cum spei nihil ad resistendum esset, C. Carvilius Spoletinus et C. Afranius a praesidio Romano missi qui a Perseo peterent primo ut armatos suaque secum ferentis abire sineret, dein, si id minus impetrarent, vitae
11 tantum libertatisque fidem acciperent. Promissum id benignius est ab rege quam praestitum: exire enim sua secum efferentibus iussis primum arma, dein libertatem[5] ademit. His urbe[6] egressis et Illyriorum cohors — quingenti erant — et Uscanenses[7] se urbemque dediderunt.

XIX. Perseus praesidio Uscanae imposito multi-

[1] corona eam capere conatus est Fr: coroneamcapereconatumest V.
[2] intermissione Fr: interestmissione V.
[3] pars add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[4] vident Madvig: videntur V: viderunt Fr.
[5] dein libertatem add. Hartel: dein omnia alia H. J. Müller: om. V.

nothing in the way of terms, Perseus began to press B.C. 169 the siege and tried to capture the city with a surrounding attack. Although without interruption through day and night relay of men after relay here brought ladders against the walls, and there fire against the gates, nevertheless, the defenders of the city withstood this tempest, because they had hopes that the Macedonians could not longer endure the violence of winter in the open, and that the lull in the Roman campaign would not long permit the king to linger. However, after they saw sheds being brought up and towers raised, their determination was overcome. For apart from the fact that they were not equally matched against the assault, there was no supply even of grain or of anything else in the city, as was natural when the siege was unexpected. And so, since there was no hope of holding out, Gaius Carvilius of Spoletium and Gaius Afranius were sent from the Roman garrison to request of Perseus, first, that he should permit them to depart under arms and carrying their possessions with them, and next, if they failed to obtain this, that they should at least receive assurances of life and freedom. The king's generosity was greater in promise than in performance; for after bidding them to depart carrying their possessions with them, he deprived them first of their arms, then of their freedom. After the Romans had left the city, both the force of Illyrians—there were five hundred of them—and the people of Uscana surrendered themselves and their city.

XIX. After placing a garrison in Uscana, Perseus

[6] His urbe Fr: hisenimurbe V.
[7] Uscanenses Sigonius: Escanienses V.

A.U.C. 585

tudinem omnem deditorum, quae prope numero
2 exercitum aequabat, Stuberram abducit. Ibi Romanis — quattuor milia autem hominum erant — praeter principes in custodiam civitatum [1] divisis, Uscanensibus Illyriisque venditis, in Penestas [2] exercitum reducit ad Oaeneum [3] oppidum in 3 potestatem redigendum, et alioqui opportune situm et transitus ea est in Labeates, ubi Gentius regnabat.
4 Praetereunti frequens castellum, Draudacum nomine, peritorum quidam regionis eius nihil Oaeneo [4] capto opus esse ait, nisi in potestate et Draudacum
5 sit; opportunius etiam ad omnia positum esse. Admoto exercitu omnes [5] extemplo dediderunt sese.

Ad [6] quam spe celeriorem deditionem [7] erectus, postquam animadvertit quantus agminis sui terror esset, undecim alia castella eodem metu in potesta-
6 tem redigit. Ad perpauca vi opus fuit, cetera voluntate dedita; et in his recepti mille et quingenti
7 dispositi per praesidia milites Romani. Magno usui Carvilius Spoletinus erat in colloquiis dicendo nihil in ipsos saevitum. Deinde [8] Oaeneum perventum est, quod sine iusta oppugnatione capi non poterat.

[1] civitatum Fr: civitatem V: civitatium Giarratano "post alios ex usu Liviano."
[2] in Penestas Heraeus: inpeneinpesiam V: in Penestiam Fr.
[3] Oaeneum Fr: eoeneum V.
[4] Oaeneo Fr: oaeneon V.
[5] omnes Fr: omne V.
[6] ad add. Harant: om. V.
[7] deditionem Fr: deditiorē V.
[8] Deinde H. J. Müller: aeide V: ad Fr.: Inde ad Duker.

took the whole mass of prisoners, which almost B.C. 169 equalled his army in numbers,[1] to Stuberra. There, after assigning the Romans—of whom there were four thousand [2]—, except the chief officers, to various cities to guard, and selling the people of Uscana and the Illyrians, he led the army back among the Penestae in order to bring under his control the town of Oaeneum, which was in many ways strategically situated, particularly in that the route to the Labeates, where Gentius was king, passes this way. As he was passing a populous fort, Draudacum by name, one who knew this region said that there was no use of capturing Oaeneum unless Draudacum too was under his control; for it was even more strategically situated for all purposes. On his bringing up his army, all at once surrendered.

Encouraged by this surrender, more prompt than he had hoped, after he noticed how great was the fear caused by his column, he brought under his control eleven other forts because of this same dread. At only a very few was there need of force; the rest were voluntarily surrendered; and in these there were taken prisoner fifteen hundred [2] Roman soldiers who had been distributed among the garrisons. Carvilius of Spoletium was most useful in the parleys, in saying that no harshness had been used against him and his comrades. Next, Perseus arrived at Oaeneum, which could not be taken without a regular

[1] According to ch. x. above, the population of Uscana was 10,000.

[2] In view of the numbers given elsewhere for garrison details (XLII. xxxvi. 9, forts of Dassaretii and Illyrians, 2000 Romans; lxvii. 9, Ambracia, 2000 men; XLIII. ix. 6, force of Claudius, 4000 Romans, 4000 local levies, to protect Illyricum in general), this number seems exaggerated.

A.U.C. 585

Et maiore aliquanto quam cetera iuventute et 8 validum oppidum moenibus erat. et hinc amnis
Artatus nomine, hinc mons praealtus et aditu
9 difficilis cingebat. Haec spem ad resistendum oppidanis dabant. Perseus circumvallato oppido aggerem a parte superiore ducere instituit, cuius 10 altitudine muros superaret. Quod opus dum perficitur, crebris interim proeliis, quibus per excursiones et moenia sua oppidani tutabantur et opera hostium impediebant, magna eorum multitudo variis casibus absumpta est, et qui supererant labore diurno nocturnoque et[1] volneribus inutiles erant.
11 Ubi primum agger iniunctus muro est, et cohors regia, quos Nicatoras appellant, transcendit et scalis multis simul partibus impetus in urbem est factus.
12 Puberes omnes interfecti sunt: coniuges liberosque eorum in custodiam dedit: praedae alia militum 13 cessere. Stuberram inde victor revertens ad Gentium[2] legatos Pleuratum Illyrium, exulantem apud 14 se, et Adaeum[3] Macedonem a Beroea[4] mittit: iis mandat, ut exponerent aestatis eius hiemisque acta

[1] et add. Fr: om. V.
[2] ad Gentium Fr: augentium V.
[3] Adaeum Valesius: aputeum V.
[4] a Beroea Fr: abeuroea V.

[1] It is not clear to what sort of unit Livy is referring; one would suppose a corps d'élite, and the reference, in XXVIII. v. 15, to a royal company kept by Philip as a mobile reserve under his personal command, would seem to confirm this; so also the royal company of Antiochus, called the Silver-Shields, in XXXVII. xl. 7; but the royal company mentioned in XL. vi. 3, at a review of the Macedonian army, would seem siege. The city was strong both because of a some- B.C. 169 what larger force of young men than the others had had and because of its walls; moreover, on the one side a river, Artatus by name, on the other a very high mountain, difficult to ascend, girt the city about. These defences gave the people of the city hope of holding out. Perseus, after encircling the town with earthworks, began to build up a mound on the higher side, high enough to bring him above the wall. While this work was in progress, the frequent battles which meanwhile took place, as the townspeople resorted to sallies to protect their walls and to hinder the siege-works of the enemy, caused a great wastage in casualties of one kind or another, while those townspeople who survived were incapacitated by daily and nightly toil and by wounds. As soon as the mound was joined to the wall, the royal company, whom they call the Conquerors,[1] passed over it, and also at the same time an attack was made with ladders against many parts of the city. All the adult males were killed; their wives and children Perseus put under guard; the other items of booty fell to the soldiers. Returning thence victoriously to Stuberra, he sent as envoys to Gentius, Pleuratus the Illyrian, who was in exile at his court, and Adaeus, a Macedonian from Beroea;[2] he instructed them to relate his achievements of that summer and winter against to be the group of young nobles described in XLV. vi. 7, as serving as royal pages or squires, cf. Arrian IV. xiii. 1, Diodorus XVII. 65, Curtius Rufus VIII. vi. 2–7, and X. vii. 16. The only other reference to the name "Conquerors" is Hesychius' definition: "the most excellent in the units" (νικατῆρες οἱ ἀκμαιότατοι ἐν ταῖς τάξεσι).

[2] Taken from Polybius XXVIII. 8; who adds the Epirotes to the list of Perseus' opponents, cf. above, xviii. 2.

A.U.C. 585

sua adversus Romanos Dardanosque; adicerent[1] recentia in Illyrico hibernae expeditionis opera; hortarentur Gentium in amicitiam secum et cum Macedonibus iungendam.

XX. Hi transgressi iugum Scordi montis, per Illyrici solitudines,[2] quas de[3] industria populando Macedones fecerant ne transitus faciles Dardanis in Illyricum aut Macedoniam essent, Scodram[4] labore ingenti tandem pervenerunt. Lissi rex Gentius
2 erat. Eo acciti legati, qui mandata exponentes benigne auditi sunt; responsum[5] sine effectu tulerunt, voluntatem sibi non deesse ad bellandum cum Romanis; ceterum ad conandum id quod velit
3 pecuniam maxime deesse. Haec Stuberram rettulere regi tum maxime captivos ex Illyrico vendenti. Extemplo iidem legati, addito Glaucia ex numero custodum corporis, remittuntur sine mentione pecuniae, qua una barbarus inops impelli ad bellum
4 poterat.[6] Ancyram inde populatus Perseus in Penestas rursus[7] exercitum reducit firmatisque

[1] hiemisque acta sua adversus Romanos Dardanosque; adicerent Fr: hiemisquaesuaeac tasuaaduersusromanosuardanos queactasuaaduersusadicerent V.

[2] solitudines Fr: sollicitudines V.

[3] de Fr: per V.

[4] Scodram Fr: iscoram V.

[5] qui hic posuit Madvig: auditi sunt, qui responsum V.

[6] qua una barbarus inops impelli ad bellum poterat Fr: qua undabarbarosinopsinepelliadebellumnonpoterat V: qua non data b.i.i.a.b. non poterat Weissenborn: itaque barbarus i.i.a.b.n.p. Brakman: qua nudatus b.i.i.a.b.n.p. Goldbacher: qua non abunde data, etc., Walter: post bellum, Romanum add. Zingerle.

[7] rursus Wesenberg: rursum V.

the Romans and Dardanians; they were to add the recent operations of his winter march into Illyricum; and they were to urge Gentius to join in friendship with Perseus and the Macedonians. B.C. 169

XX. After crossing the ridge of Mount Scordus, and passing through the desert regions of Illyricum, which the Macedonians had purposely made desert by ravaging, so that there might be no easy passage for the Dardanians to Illyricum or Macedonia, these envoys came at last with great toil to Scodra. King Gentius was at Lissus. Thither the envoys were summoned, and their message was given a favourable hearing; but the reply which they took away accomplished nothing; it was to the effect that Gentius did not lack the will to fight the Romans, but to try to effect his will he did especially lack money. These words the envoys reported at Stuberra to the king, who was at that moment engaged in selling the prisoners from Illyricum. At once the same envoys, with the addition of Glaucias from among the king's bodyguard, were sent back with no word about money, by which alone the poverty-stricken barbarian could be urged into war.[1] Thence, after ravaging Ancyra,[2] Perseus led his army back again among the

[1] On Perseus' stinginess, cf. XLII. lxvii. 5 and the note, XLIV. xxvi. 1, Polybius XXVIII. 9; Plutarch, Aemilius xii. 4–xiii. 2 mentions the Bastarnae as also victims of Perseus' greed, and points out the contrast to Alexander the Great and Philip, his father, who disregarded money for the sake of conquest.

[2] The situation of Ancyra is unknown; we cannot be sure whether it is a town, a district, or a mistake. In Polybius XXVIII. 8. 11, in place of a corrupt word (ἐπακκωναν), Ursinus proposed reading ἐπ' Ἄγκυραν, on the basis of this reference in Livy; but modern editors prefer the emendation ἐφ' Ὑσκανα.

A.U.C. 585

Uscanae et circa eam per omnia castella quae receperat praesidiis in Macedoniam sese recipit.

XXI. L. Coelius, legatus Romanus, praeerat Illyrico; qui moveri non ausus cum in iis locis rex esset,[1] post profectionem demum eius conatus in Penestis Uscanam recipere, a praesidio quod ibi Macedonum erat cum multis vulneribus repulsus Lychnidum [2] 2 copias reduxit. Inde post dies paucos M. Trebellium Fregellanum cum satis valida manu in [3] Penestas misit ad obsides ab iis [4] urbibus quae in amicitia cum 3 fide permanserant accipiendos; procedere etiam in Parthinos — ii quoque obsides dare pepigerant — iussit. Ab utraque gente sine tumultu exigit.[5] Penestarum equites Apolloniam, Parthinorum Dyrrachium, — tum Epidamni magis celebre nomen 4 Graecis erat — missi. Ap. Claudius acceptam in Illyrico ignominiam corrigere cupiens Phanotam,[6] Epiri castellum, adortus oppugnare [7] est. Auxilia Chaonum Thesprotorumque [8] praeter Romanum exercitum, ad sex milia hominum, secum adduxit;

[1] rex esset Fr: rexnonesset V.
[2] Lychnidum Sigonius: lycidu V.
[3] in add. Fr: om. V.
[4] iis Kreyssig: his V.
[5] exigit Weissenborn: exigi V.
[6] Phanotam Drakenborch: Phalanom V.
[7] oppugnare Madvig: oppugnari V.
[8] Chaonum Thesprotorumque Madvig: Thoanumtesprotorumque V.

[1] The relative positions of Coelius and Claudius, above, ix–x, below, §§ 4–5, xxiii. 1–2 and 6, and XLIV. xx. 5, cannot be exactly determined; perhaps they had different sectors, in spite of the story of Claudius' fiasco before Uscana, cf. note 4, p. 35.

Penestae and, having strengthened the garrisons in Uscana and in all the forts that he had captured round about it, retired to Macedonia. B.C. 169

XXI. Lucius Coelius, a Roman staff-officer,[1] was in charge of Illyricum; he had not dared to stir while the king was in those parts, but after his departure at last attempted in the Penestian country to retake Uscana, and, being driven back with many wounded by the Macedonian garrison which was there, led his forces back to Lychnidus. Thence after a few days he sent Marcus Trebellius of Fregellae with a strong enough detachment among the Penestae to receive hostages from those cities which had remained loyal to the alliance; he ordered Trebellius to proceed also to the Parthini,[2] for they had likewise promised to give hostages. From both peoples Trebellius exacted the hostages without disturbance. The knights of the Penestae were sent to Apollonia, those of the Parthini to Dyrrachium—at that time the name Epidamnus was more generally in use among the Greeks.[3] Appius Claudius, eager to atone for the disgrace he had received in Illyricum,[4] attempted to besiege Phanote, a fort of Epirus. He took with him auxiliaries from the Chaonians [5] and Thesprotians, besides his Roman army, a total of about six

[2] They had been recognized as allies of the Romans in 205 B.C. (Polybius II. 11. 11, VII. 9. 13, Livy XXIX. xii. 13), but seem to have come again under Philip's rule; in 196 B.C., XXXIII. xxxiv. 11, they were put under Pleuratus, the father of Gentius (not the exile mentioned above, xix. 13), who had aided Rome against Philip (XXXI. xxviii. 1–3, xl. 10; cf. also below, xxiii. 6).

[3] Including Polybius, e.g., XXXIV. 7.

[4] Cf. above, ix–x.

[5] Phanote lay in their territory; the Chaonians were divided in their attachment, some holding with Perseus.

A.U.C. 585

5 neque operae pretium fecit Cleua,[1] qui relictus a Perseo erat, cum valido praesidio defendente. Et Perseus, Elimeam profectus et circa eam exercitu[2] lustrato ad Stratum vocantibus Epirotis ducit. 6 Stratus validissima tum urbs Aetoliae erat[3]; sita est super Ambracium sinum prope[4] amnem Inachum.[5] Cum decem milibus peditum eo profectus est et equitibus trecentis, quos pauciores propter 7 angustias viarum et asperitatem duxit. Tertio[6] die cum pervenisset ad Citium montem, vix transgressus propter altitudinem nivis locum quoque 8 castris aegre invenit. Profectus inde, magis quia manere non poterat, quam[7] quod tolerabilis aut via aut tempestas esset, cum ingenti vexatione praecipue iumentorum altero die ad templum Iovis, Nicaeum 9 quem vocant, posuit castra. Ad Aratthum[8] inde flumen itinere ingenti emenso retentus altitudine amnis . . .[9] mansit. Quo spatio temporis ponte perfecto, traductis copiis diei progressus iter obvium

[1] Cleua Fr: creua V.
[2] eam exercitu Fr: eametexercitu V.
[3] validissima tum urbs Aetoliae erat Fr: validissimumurbsaetolierat V.
[4] Ambracium sinum prope Fr: ambraciamsineprope V.
[5] Inachum Kreyssig: acaum V.
[6] Tertio Fr: certo V.
[7] quam add. Fr: om. V.
[8] Aratthum Hertz: Arachthum Weissenborn: arratum V.
[9] Excidit num. dierum; malim dies III cum Zingerle.

[1] Here the city, not the district as in XXXI. xl. 1, XLII. liii. 5, and Plutarch, Aemilius ix. 3.
[2] Epirote exiles, cf. below xxii. 9, unless this is a mistake for "Aetolians."
[3] Until 270 B.C. the chief city of Acarnania, Stratus was then given to the Aetolians. The river is properly the thousand men; he did not accomplish anything B.C. 169 worth his trouble, since Cleuas, who had been left by Perseus, was defending it with a strong garrison. Perseus also, setting out for Elimea,[1] and purifying his army in that neighbourhood, led his force, at the invitation of the Epirotes,[2] to Stratus. Stratus was at that time the strongest city of Aetolia; it is situated inland from the Ambracian Gulf near the River Inachus.[3] Perseus set out thither with ten thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry, a smaller number of which [4] he took with him because of the narrowness and roughness of the roads. When on the third day he had arrived at Mount Citium, the snow was so deep that he barely succeeded in crossing and had difficulty also in finding a place for his camp. Setting out thence, more because he could not stay than because either the way or the weather was bearable, with great suffering, especially of the baggage-animals, on the second day he pitched camp at the temple of Jupiter whom they call the Victorious.[5] Thence having traversed a huge march to the Aratthus River, he halted . . . delayed by the depth of the river. In this length of time a bridge was finished, and, leading his troops across, he proceeded one day's march and effected a meeting with Acheloös (cf. e.g., Polybius V. 13. 10); the name Inachus was sometimes applied to the upper portion of the Acheloös which was mistakenly regarded as a tributary, hence, perhaps, Livy's mistake.

[4] Two hundred less cavalry (and apparently the two thousand light troops were also omitted) than on the previous expedition; above, xviii. 4.

[5] Zeus Nikaios is named in inscriptions from Asia Minor; Cassius Dio XLVII. 40. 2 uses this name as a translation of "Jupiter Victor" at Rome.

A.U.C. 585

Archidamum, principem Aetolorum per quem ei Stratus tradebatur habuit.

XXII. Eo die ad finem agri Aetolici [1] castra posita; 2 inde altero die ad Stratum perventum; ubi prope Inachum amnem castris positis,[2] cum expectaret effusos omnibus portis [3] Aetolos in fidem suam venturos, clausas portas atque ipsa ea nocte qua venerat receptum Romanum praesidium cum C. 3 Popilio legato invenit. Principes, qui praesentis Archidami auctoritate compulsi regem arcessierant, obviam egresso Archidamo segniores facti locum adversae factioni dederant ad Popilium cum mille 4 peditibus ab Ambracia accersendum. In tempore et Dinarchus, praefectus equitum gentis Aetolorum, cum sescentis peditibus et equitibus centum venit.[4] 5 Satis constabat [5] eum tamquam ad Persea tendentem Stratum venisse, mutato deinde cum fortuna animo 6 Romanis se, adversus quos venerat, iunxisse. Nec Popilius securior quam debebat esse inter tam mobilia ingenia erat. Claves portarum custodiamque 7 murorum suae extemplo potestatis fecit: Dinarchum Aetolosque cum iuventute Stratiorum in arcem per 8 praesidii speciem amovit. Perseus ab imminentibus superiori parti urbis tumulis temptatis colloquiis, cum

[1] agri Aetolici Madvig: agricolis V.
[2] positis add. Fr: om. V.
[3] portis Fr: positis V.
[4] centum venit Fr: T V.
[5] constabat Fr: consultabat V.

[1] Archidamus is mentioned by Polybius XXVIII. 4. 8 as accused of anti-Romanism by Lyciscus, a professional pro-Roman, cf. Vol. XII. p. 403, and 478, note 1.
[2] Cf. above, xvii. 10.

Archidamus, a prominent Aetolian, who was trying B.C. 169 to hand over Stratus to him.[1]

XXII. On that day camp was pitched at the edge of Aetolian territory; thence on the second day they arrived at Stratus. Although, when he pitched camp there near the Inachus River, Perseus expected the Aetolians to come streaming out of every gate to put themselves under his protection, he found that the gates were closed and that on the very night when he had arrived a Roman garrison, under the staff-officer Gaius Popilius, had been received. The leading men, driven by the influence of Archidamus while he was there, had summoned the king, but had become less active when Archidamus had gone out to meet Perseus, and had given an opportunity to the opposing party of summoning Popilius with a thousand infantry from Ambracia.[2] Just in time, too, came Dinarchus, the chief of cavalry [3] of the Aetolian League, with six hundred infantry and a hundred cavalry. It was well known that he had come to Stratus as if on his way to Perseus, but then, changing his mind with his luck, had joined the Romans, against whom he had come. Popilius, for his part, was not more off his guard than he should have been, considering the fickle temperaments which encompassed him. He at once took control of the keys of the gates and the guarding of the walls, and removed to the citadel, ostensibly as its garrison, Dinarchus and his Aetolians, along with the young men of Stratus. Perseus, after attempting parleys from the hills which overhang the upper part of the [3] This officer was second in command of the Aetolian League, cf. XXXVIII. xi. 7.

A.U.C. 585

obstinatos atque etiam telis procul arcentis[1] videret, quinque milia passuum ab urbe trans Peti-
9 tarum amnem posuit castra. Ibi consilio advocato cum Archidamus Epirotarumque transfugae retinerent. Macedonum[2] principes non pugnandum cum infesto tempore anni censerent, nullis praeparatis
10 commeatibus, cum inopiam prius obsidentes quam obsessi sensuri[3] essent, maxime quod hostium haud[4] procul inde hiberna erant, territus in Aperantiam
11 castra movit. Aperantii eum[5] propter Archidami magnam in ea gente gratiam auctoritatemque consensu omnium acceperunt; is ipse cum octingentorum militum[6] praesidio his est praepositus.

XXIII. Rex cum non[7] minore vexatione iumentorum hominumque quam venerat in Macedoniam rediit; Appium tamen ab obsidione Phanotes fama
2 ducentis ad Stratum Persei summovit. Cleuas cum praesidio impigrorum iuvenum insecutus sub radicibus prope inviis montium[8] ad mille hominum ex agmine
3 impedito occidit, ad ducentos cepit. Appius superatis angustiis in campo quem Meleona vocant stativa dierum paucorum habuit. Interim Cleuas assumpto Philostrato, qui quingentos ex[9] Epirotarum gente habebat, in agrum Antigonensem transcendit.[10]

[1] arcentis Fr: argentis V.
[2] Macedonum Fr: macedonicum V.
[3] obsessi sensuri Fr: obsessucensuri V.
[4] haud Fr: aut V.
[5] Aperantii eum Fr: Aperantiaecum V.
[6] militum Fr: millium V.
[7] non add. Drakenborch: om. V.
[8] montium Fr: mouentium V.
[9] quingentos ex add. Hertz: delectos ex add. Weissenborn: om. V: quingentos pro gente scripsit Madvig.
[10] Antigonensem transcendit Fr: antigonensemhabebat-transcendit V.

city,[1] on seeing that they were determined and were B.C. 169 even keeping him at a distance with missiles, pitched his camp five miles from the city across the river Petitarus. There he called a council and, although Archidamus and the Epirote deserters tried to keep him where he was, when the leading Macedonians were of the opinion that he should not fight against the unfavourable season of the year without having arranged for supplies, since the blockaders were bound to feel the want of them before the blockaded, especially when winter-quarters of the enemy were not far distant, Perseus in fear moved his camp into Aperantia.[2] The Aperantians, because of their great regard for Archidamus and his influence with that people, by general agreement received Perseus; Archidamus himself, with a garrison of eight hundred men, was put in charge of the city.

XXIII. With no less suffering of beasts and men than when he had come, the king returned to Macedonia; Appius, however, was drawn away from the siege of Phanote by the report that Perseus was marching on Stratus. Cleuas, following with a force of vigorous young men beneath the almost impassable spurs of the mountains, killed about a thousand men of the burdened column and captured about two hundred. After passing over the narrows, Appius remained in camp a few days in the plain which they call Meleon. Meanwhile Cleuas, taking along Philostratus, who had five hundred of the Epirote people, crossed over to the territory of [1] To the north; ruins of the small citadel are traceable in this quarter.

[2] Taken by the Aetolians from Philip in 189 B.C., XXXVIII. iii. 4.

A.U.C. 585

4 Macedones ad depopulationem profecti; Philostratus cum cohorte sua in insidiis loco [1] obscuro consedit. In palatos populatores cum erupissent ab Antigonea armati,[2] fugientes eos persequentes effusius in 5 vallem insessam ab hostibus praecipitant. Ibi ad mille [3] occisis, centum ferme captis, et ubique prospere gesta re prope stativa Appi castra movent, ne qua vis sociis suis ab Romano exercitu inferri
6 possit. Appius nequiquam in his locis terens tempus, dimissis Chaonum Thesprotorumque [4] et si qui alii Epirotae erant praesidiis, cum Italicis militibus in Illyricum regressus, per Parthinorum [5] socias urbes in hiberna militibus divisis,[6] ipse Romam sacrificii
7 causa redit. Perseus ex Penestarum gente mille pedites, ducentos equites revocatos Cassandream, 8 praesidio ut essent, misit. Ab Gentio eadem adferentes redierunt. Nec deinde alios atque alios mittendo temptare eum destitit, cum appareret, quantum in eo praesidii esset, nec tamen impetrare ab animo posset, ut impensam in rem maximi ad omnia momenti faceret.

[1] loco Fr: deloco V.

[2] erupissent ab Antigonea armati Fr: erupis setabantigatonemarmam V.

[3] praecipitant. Ibi ad mille Giarratano: praecipitantibusidem V: Ibi (vel inde) mille Weissenborn: Ibidem mille Goldbacher: Ibi DC Heraeus (at MS. AC praebuisset).

[4] Chaonum Thesprotorumque Madvig: Chaonumque V.

[5] Parthinorum Sigonius: Parteniorum V.

[6] divisis I. Perizonius: dimissis V.

Antigonea. The Macedonians set out to plunder; B.C. 169
Philostratus with his detachment settled down in ambush in a hidden spot. When armed men sallied forth from Antigonea against the scattered plunderers, as they pursued in too open order after these fugitives, they burst into the valley ambushed by the enemy. After the killing there of about a thousand and the capturing of nearly a hundred, the campaign was successfully conducted everywhere, and they moved their camp near the settled camp of Appius, so that no violence might be inflicted by the Roman army on their allies. Appius, who was wasting time to no purpose in these parts, after sending away the forces of Chaonians, Thesprotians and whatever other Epirotes there were, retired to Illyricum with his Italian soldiers, divided his men in winter-quarters among the allied cities of the Parthini, and himself returned to Rome to offer sacrifices. Perseus sent to Cassandrea to act as its garrison a thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry recalled from the people of the Penestae. The envoys returned from Gentius with the same reply. On the one hand, Perseus did not cease thereafter to make overtures to him by sending embassy after embassy, and, on the other hand, although it was obvious how much reinforcement Gentius could provide, yet he could not induce himself to incur expense for a matter of the greatest importance in every respect.[1]

[1] Cf. above, p. 73, note 1.

LIBRI XLIII PERIOCHA

PRAETORES aliquot eo, quod avare et crudeliter provincias administraverant, damnati sunt. P. Licinius Crassus pro cos. complures in Graecia urbes expugnavit et crudeliter corripuit: ob id captivi, qui ab eo sub corona venierant, ex s.c.[1] postea restituti sunt. Item a praefectis classium Romanarum multa impotenter in socios facta. Res a Perse rege in Thracia prospere gestas continet, victis[2] Dardanis et Illyrico, cuius rex erat Gentius. Motus, qui in Hispania ab Olonico factus erat, ipso interempto consedit. M. Aemilius Lepidus a censoribus princeps senatus[3] lectus.

[1] ex s.c. ed. princeps: et sic, etsi, alia, MSS.
[2] victis Frobenius: et victis MSS.
[3] senatus edd.: om. MSS.: in senatu ed. princeps.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLIII

SEVERAL praetors were condemned for having administered their provinces with greed and cruelty.[1] Publius Licinius Crassus the proconsul stormed and cruelly plundered numerous cities in Greece; because of this the prisoners who had been sold at auction by him were afterward restored by decree of the senate.[2] Likewise many disorderly acts were committed against allies by the commanders of Roman fleets.[3] The book includes successes obtained by King Perseus in Thrace, and his conquest of the Dardanians and of Illyricum, the king of which was Gentius.[4] A revolt in Spain, which was organized by Olonicus, collapsed when he had been killed.[5] Marcus Aemilius Lepidus was chosen chief of the Senate by the censors.[6]

[1] Cf. ii.

[2] Licinius seems to have committed these acts in his consulship, cf. iv. 5; an account of his campaign seems to have been lost after ch. iii, cf. n. 7, p. 13.

[3] Cf. iv. 5–13, vii. 8–viii. 9.

[4] The account is lost, cf. n. 7, p. 13, except for the reference in xix. 4; the implication that Gentius was attacked is wrong, cf. xix. 13–xx. 3, xxiii. 8.

[5] Cf. n. 7, p. 14, and iv. 1–4.

[6] Cf. xv. 6.

APPENDIX

The intercalary month regularly began after Feb. 23, and consisted of 22 or 23 days, to which were added the last five days of February.

The usual arrangement of the year, established according to legend under Numa (Livy I. xix. 6) and actually perhaps at the establishment of the republic (cf. the "restoration" mentioned by Dionysius, Roman Antiquities III. 36. 4), called for a regular moon-year of 355 days, with intercalation of 22 and 23 days, alternately, every second year. (The number of days in the year thus ran 355, 377, 355, 378, etc.) A cycle of 24 years was observed, in the twentieth year of which the intercalary month had only 22 days, not 23, while in the twenty-fourth year, the intercalary month was omitted. Thus the average error of one day a year in the ordinary succession of regular and intercalary years was corrected at the end of the 24-year cycle (cf. Macrobius I. 13. 13–21).

This calendar appears to have been in order in 211–10 B.C. (cf. Livy XXVII. iv. 1). In 190 B.C., on the other hand, there was an error of 125 days (cf. XXXVII. iv. 4 and the note, Vol. X, pp. 300–1). An explanation suggested by Unger, Iwan Müller's Handbuch, Vol. I, 1886, pp. 634–42, who has been followed in this note as a whole, is as follows: In 207 B.C., owing to the terror inspired by Hasdrubal's invasion of Italy, a change to a sun-year of 365 days was planned in honour of Apollo, cf. the procession in his honour described in XXVII. xxxvii. end, which also propitiated Juno the Queen (as moon-goddess? —cf. C.I.L. 5, i, 3233 (Verona): IUN(oni) LUN(ae) REG(inae) SACR.—a dedication of a freedman, of imperial date). Intercalations were accordingly omitted till 192 B.C. (cf. Macrobius I. 14, "there was a time when all intercalations were omitted for a religious reason—propter superstitionem"), but the novelty of adding ten days to the standard year was also omitted after its first occurrence. We must assume that a cycle-end fell within the period of fourteen years, so that one intercalation would normally have been omitted, leaving six which were dropped because of the new arrangement. Six intercalations = 135 days, less ten extra days in 207 B.C. = 125 days lost from account. In 191 B.C. the consul Acilius Glabrio sponsored a law which gave the pontiffs a free hand to regulate intercalation (Macrobius I. 13. 21), probably to secure the gradual correction of the error. The intercalation of the year 169 may well have been an extraordinary one, as well as that of 167 B.C. (XLV. xliv. 3), thus arousing the special interest reflected by Livy's mention of these events, for he does not mention all the intercalations which must have occurred. The calendar could have been corrected by about 163 B.C.

BOOK XLIV

LIBER XLIV

A.U.C. 585

I. Principio veris, quod hiemem eam, qua haec gesta sunt, insecutum est, ab Roma profectus Q. Marcius Philippus consul cum quinque milibus militum,[1] quos [2] in supplementum legionum secum traiecturus
2 erat, Brundisium pervenit. M. Popilius consularis et alii pari nobilitate adulescentes tribuni militum in 3 Macedonicas legiones consulem secuti sunt. Per eos dies et C. Marcius Figulus praetor, cui classis provincia evenerat, Brundisium venit; et simul ex Italia profecti Corcyram altero die, tertio Actium, 4 Acarnaniae portum, tenuerunt. Inde consul ad Ambraciam egressus itinere terrestri petit Thessaliam; praetor superato Leucata Corinthium sinum invectus et Creusae relictis navibus terra et ipse per mediam Boeotiam—diei unius expedito iter est—Chalcidem ad classem contendit.
5 Castra eo tempore A. Hostilius in Thessalia circa Palaepharsalum habebat, sicut nulla re bellica

[1] militum H. J. Müller: om. V.
[2] quos H. J. Müller: quod V: quot Drakenborch: quod supplementum J. F. Gronovius.

---

[1] Cf. XLII. xxxvii.–xlvii. and lvi. 7.
[2] This figure seems to come from Polybius. A larger figure for these reinforcements is mentioned in XLIII. xii. 3.

BOOK XLIV

I. At the beginning of the spring following the B.C. 169 winter campaigns just mentioned, Quintus Marcius Philippus [1] the consul left Rome and reached Brundisium with five thousand [2] men whom he planned to take over with him as reinforcements for the legions. The ex-consul Marcus Popilius [3] and some young men of equally high birth accompanied the consul as tribunes of the soldiers [4] in the legions for Macedonia. About the same time Gaius Marcius Figulus [5] the praetor, who had been assigned to the fleet, arrived in Brundisium, and the two commanders left Italy together, reached Corcyra the next day, and made port at Actium, the harbour of Acarnania, on the day after. Thence the consul disembarked at Ambracia and marched overland to Thessaly; the praetor rounded Cape Leucas, entered the Gulf of Corinth and, leaving his ships at Creusa, also took to the land and made for the fleet at Chalcis through the midst of Boeotia—one day's rapid journey.

At this time Aulus Hostilius had his camp in Thessaly near Old Pharsalus, having on the one hand performed no military feat worth mentioning, but on

[3] Cf. XLII. xxii. 7.
[4] Perhaps elected by the people, see XLIII. xii. 7.
[5] A cousin of the consul Philippus. Cf. Polybius XVIII. 16. 4; Livy XLIII. xi. 7.

A.U.C. 585

memorabili gesta, ita ad intentam[1] militarem disciplinam ab effusa licentia formato milite et sociis cum fide cultis et ab omni genere iniuriae defensis.
6 Audito successoris adventu cum arma viros equos cum cura inspexisset,[2] ornato exercitu obviam venienti
7 consuli processit. Et primus eorum congressus ex dignitate ipsorum ac Romani nominis, et in rebus
8 deinde gerendis—proconsul enim ad exercitum mansit[3]—summa concordia fuit.[4]
9 Paucis post diebus consul contionem apud milites
10 habuit. Orsus a parricidio Persei perpetrato in fratrem, cogitato in parentem, adiecit post scelere partum regnum veneficia, caedes, latrocinio nefando petitum Eumenen, iniurias in populum Romanum, direptiones sociarum urbium contra foedus.

Ea omnia quam diis quoque invisa essent, sensurum
11 in exitu rerum suarum: favere enim pietati fideique deos, per quae populus Romanus ad tantum fastigii
12 venerit. Vires deinde populi Romani, iam terrarum orbem complectentis, cum viribus Macedoniae, exercitus cum exercitibus comparavit: quanto maiores Philippi Antiochique opes non maioribus copiis fractas esse?

[1] intentam Novák, Giarratano: iunctam V: cunctam Fr: unicam J. F. Gronovius: iustam Kreyssig: iniunctam Zingerle: arctam Damsté: adstrictam vel strictam Roobol.
[2] inspexisset Manutius: inexisset V.
[3] mansit add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[4] summa concordia fuit add. Wesenberg: om. V.

---

[1] For the attacks of Perseus against his brother, cf. XL. v ff. and xx ff.; in XL. lvi. 9, Philip is represented as having died in anger against Perseus, but Livy gives no description of the plot here alleged.

the other hand having accustomed the soldiery to B.C. 169 strict military discipline in place of uncontrolled laxness and having loyally furthered the interests of the allies and protected them from any kind of harm. On hearing of his successor's approach, he carefully inspected his men, their arms, and their horses, and with his army in parade order went to meet the approaching consul. Not only was the first meeting of the commanders in accord with the high station both of the men themselves and of the Roman name, but the utmost harmony prevailed in their subsequent operations, for the proconsul remained with the army.

A few days later the consul addressed a meeting of his soldiers. Beginning with the unnatural crimes of Perseus committed against his brother and planned against his father,[1] he went on to mention the acquisition of the throne by crime, the subsequent poisonings and slaughter, the attack by scoundrelly bandits on Eumenes, the wrongs committed by Perseus against the Roman people, and the plunderings of cities allied to them, contrary to treaty.

"How hateful all these actions are to the gods also," said the consul, "Perseus will discover in the outcome of his enterprises; for the gods support the cause of duty and faithfulness, the qualities by which the Roman people has climbed to so great an eminence." The consul then compared the strength of the Roman people, who now controlled the whole earth, with that of Macedonia, and the military forces of the one with the other, and asked how much greater were the resources of Philip and Antiochus, which had been shattered by forces no greater than this Roman army?

A.U.C. 585

II. Huius generis adhortatione accensis militum animis consultare de summa gerendi belli coepit. Eo et C. Marcius praetor a Chalcide classe accepta venit. 2 Placuit non ultra morando in Thessalia tempus terere, sed movere extemplo castra atque inde 3 pergere in [1] Macedoniam, et praetorem dare operam, ut eodem tempore classis quoque invehatur hostium litoribus.

4 Praetore dimisso consul menstruum frumentum [2] iusso milite secum ferre profectus decumo post die, 5 quam exercitum acceperat, castra movit; et unius diei progressus iter convocatis itinerum ducibus cum exponere in consilio [3] iussisset, qua quisque ducturus esset, summotis iis, quam potissimum viam [4] peteret, 6 rettulit ad consilium. Aliis per Pythoum placebat via, aliis per Cambunios montes, qua priore anno duxerat Hostilius consul, aliis praeter Ascuridem 7 paludem. Restabat aliquantum viae communis; itaque in id tempus, quo prope divortium itinerum castra posituri erant, deliberatio eius rei differtur. 8 In Perrhaebiam inde ducit, et inter Azorum et Dolichen stativa habuit ad consulendum rursus, quam 9 potissimum capesseret viam. Per eosdem dies Perseus cum adpropinquare hostem sciret, quod iter

[1] atque inde pergere in Kreyssig: adque inde peregre inde in V.

[2] frumentum add. Madvig: om. V.

[3] exponere in consilio J. F. Gronovius: exponerent in concilio V.

[4] viam add. Novák, Ceské: post quam Sigonius: om. V.

---

[1] For Pythoüs, cf. XLII. liii. 6 and below, xxxii. 9 and xxxv. 15. Perseus entered Thessaly by the Cambunian Mountain route, cf. XLII. liii. 6; Livy's account of the march of

II. After the consul had aroused the ardour of the soldiers by a speech to this effect, he began to hold councils on strategy. Gaius Marcius the praetor, after picking up the fleet at Chalcis, arrived in camp. It was decided not to waste more time by lingering in Thessaly, but to break camp at once and proceed thence into Macedonia, while the praetor was to make sure that the fleet should simultaneously attack the hostile coast-line. B.C. 169

After the praetor's departure, the consul ordered his soldiers to take with them grain for a month and broke camp nine days after having assumed command; after a day's march, he summoned the guides for various routes, bade each explain before the council the route by which he would guide them, and then, after dismissing the guides, laid before the council the question of which route to choose. Some preferred the road via Pythoüs; others the one over the Cambunian Mountains used the preceding year by the consul Hostilius; others, a route past Lake Ascuris.[1] For a certain distance yet there was no divergence in the routes; therefore the discussion as to this choice was postponed until they should encamp near the point of separation of the roads. Thence the consul led his army into Perrhaebia and settled down between Azorus and Doliche [2] for further conference as to the road to take. During the same time Perseus, knowing that the enemy was approach-

Hostilius seems to have disappeared in one of the lacunae, cf. p. 14 n. 7. Volustana, mentioned below, sec. 10, is at the north-east end of this route, next to Mt. Olympus. Lake Ascuris is the modern Nezeros.

[2] This seems to have been farther west than necessary for the Ascuris route.

A.U.C. 585

petiturus esset, ignarus, omnis saltus insidere 10 praesidiis statuit. In iugum Cambuniorum montium
—Volustana ipsi vocant—decem milia levis armaturae 11 iuvenum [1] cum duce Asclepiodoto mittit; ad castellum, quod super Ascuridem paludem erat—Lapathus vocatur locus—, Hippias tenere saltum cum duodecim 12 milium Macedonum praesidio iussus. Ipse cum reliquis copiis primo circa Dium stativa habuit; deinde adeo inops consilii,[2] ut obtorpuisse videretur, cum equitibus expeditis litore nunc Heracleum,[3] nunc Philam percurrebat, eodem inde cursu Dium repetens.

III. Interim consuli sententia stetit eo saltu ducere, ubi propter Ottolobum dux regius castra 2 habebat.[4] Praemitti tamen quattuor milia arma-torum ad loca opportuna praeoccupanda placuit, quibus [5] praepositi sunt M. Claudius, Q. Marcius 3 consulis filius. Confestim et universae copiae seque-bantur. Ceterum adeo ardua et aspera et confragosa fuit via,[6] ut praemissi expediti biduo quindecim milium passuum aegre itinere confecto castra

[1] sic V: iuvenum del. H. J. Müller: alienigenum vel plurium gentium Madvig: varium genus M. Müller.

[2] deinde adeo inops consilii Hartel: deinde adeo ut obtorpuisse inops consilii V: deinde a Dio, ne obtorpuisse inops consilii Gitlbauer.

[3] Heracleum J. F. Gronovius: Heracleam V.

[4] dux regius castra habebat Hartel: duximus regis castra V.

[5] quibus Wesenberg: qui V.

[6] via add. H. J. Müller: om. V: confragosa via fuit Fr.

---

[1] "Young men" seems superfluous, and editors are inclined to substitute an expression suggesting whence the troops came.

[2] Asclepiodotus is mentioned in XLII. li. 7 as a commander of Gauls; Hippias appears in XLII. li. 3 and lix. 7 as a commander of phalanx-men.

ing, but unaware which route he would choose, B.C. 169 decided to occupy all the passes with forces. To the summit of the Cambunian Mountains (which the Macedonians themselves call Volustana) he sent ten thousand light-armed young men[1] under the command of Asclepiodotus; near the fort above Lake Ascuris—Lapathus is the name of the place—Hippias was ordered to hold the pass with a force of twelve thousand Macedonians.[2] The king himself with the rest of his forces remained in camp near Dium; later, so planlessly that he seemed to have lost his mind, he would dash with some unencumbered cavalry along the shore, now to Heracleum, now to Phila, returning without halt to Dium.[3]

III. Meanwhile the consul had settled on the plan of proceeding by the pass where the king's officer was encamped near Ottolobus.[4] It was decided, however, to send ahead four thousand men to seize valuable advance positions; the commanders of this force were Marcus Claudius and Quintus Marcius, the son of the consul. Immediately the whole Roman army followed. However, so steep, rough, and rugged was the road that the advance forces, travelling light, barely completed a two days' march of fifteen miles

[3] This patrolling may not have been as senseless as Livy would have it; Livy seems to be convinced that the gods made Perseus mad, preparatory to destroying him; but if Perseus had happened upon the Romans when they actually came down from the mountains, it would have been to his advantage. Cf. Diodorus XXX. 10 for the same view of Perseus' folly; ibid. 2 elaborates the incident told below, vi. 1.

[4] I.e., the pass by Lake Ascuris. Cf. Herodotus VII. 128 on Xerxes' choice of routes in 480 B.C.; he went via Perrhaebia and Gonnus.

A.U.C. 585

posuerint. Dierum, quem [1] cepere, locum appellant. 4 Inde postero die septem milia progressi, tumulo haud procul hostium castris capto, nuntium ad consulem remittunt perventum ad hostem esse; loco se tuto et ad omnia opportuno consedisse; quantum [2] 5 extendere iter posset, consequeretur. Sollicito consuli et propter itineris difficultatem, quod ingressus erat, et eorum vicem, quos paucos inter media praesidia hostium praemiserat, nuntius ad Ascuridem palu- 6 dem occurrit. Addita igitur et ipsi fiducia est, coniunctisque copiis castra tumulo, qui tenebatur, qua aptissimum ad loci naturam erat, sunt acclinata. 7 Non hostium modo castra, quae paulo plus mille passuum aberant, sed omnis regio ad Dium et Philam oraque maris late patente ex tam alto iugo prospectu 8 oculis subicitur. Quae res accendit militi animos, postquam summam belli ac regias omnis copias terramque hostilem tam e propinquo conspexerunt. 9 Itaque cum alacres, protinus duceret ad castra hostium, consulem hortarentur, dies unus fessis labore 10 viae ad quietem datus est. Tertio die parte copiarum ad praesidium castrorum relicta consul ad hostem ducit.

IV. Hippias nuper ad tuendum saltum ab rege missus erat; qui ex quo castra Romana in tumulo conspexit, praeparatis ad certamen animis suorum venienti agmini consulis obvius fuit. Et Romani

[1] posuerint. Dierum quem Novák: posuerint fuerimque dierumquē V: posuerint quieverintque. Dierum quem Madvig: posuerint requieverintque. Dierum quem Vahlen: posuerint fuerintque ibi illa nocte. Dierum quem Goldbacher.

[2] quantum H. J. Müller: ut quantum V.

before pitching camp. The place they occupied is B.C. 169 called Dierus. Thence on the following day they advanced seven miles, seized a hill not far from the enemy's camp, and reported by messenger to the consul that they were in contact with the enemy, that they had occupied a place safe and suitable for all purposes, and that he should follow them as rapidly as he could march. While the consul was worrying both over the difficulty of the journey upon which he had entered and over the fate of the small force which he had sent ahead into the midst of hostile garrisons, he was met by the messenger near Lake Ascuris. The consul thereupon gained confidence, and after joining the advance force encamped beneath the hill which had been seized, in the place best adapted through the nature of the terrain. Not only the enemy camp, a little over a mile away, but the whole region to Dium, Phila, and the seashore was before their eyes in the extensive view from so lofty a ridge. This sight roused the spirits of the soldiery, after they had a birdseye view of the whole campaign, including all the king's forces and the land of the enemy, from so near by. Although the soldiers, made eager by this sight, urged the consul to lead them at once to the enemy's camp, one day's rest was given them, since they were weary from the toil of the march. Next day, the consul, leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, advanced against the enemy.

IV. Hippias had recently been sent by the king to guard the pass; as soon as he saw the Roman camp on its hill, he roused the spirits of his men to combat; and now he marched out against the oncoming column of the consul. The Romans had come out unencum-

A.U.C. 585

expediti ad pugnam exierant, et hostes levis armatura
2 erat, promptissimum genus ad lacessendum certa-
3 men. Congressi igitur extemplo tela coniecerunt; multa utrimque volnera temerario incursu et accepta
4 et inlata; pauci utriusque partis ceciderunt. Inritatis in posterum diem animis maioribus copiis atque infestius concursum est; decrevissentque de summa belli, si loci [1] satis ad explicandam aciem fuisset; sed [2] iugum montis in angustum dorsum cuneatum vix ternis ordinibus armatorum in fronte patuit.
5 Itaque paucis pugnantibus cetera multitudo praecipue qui gravium armorum erant, spectatores pugnae sta-
6 bant; levis armatura etiam per anfractus iugi procurrere et ab lateribus cum levi armatura conserere per iniqua atque aequa loca pugnam poterat. Pluribus [3] ea [4] die volneratis quam interfectis proelium nocte diremptum est.
7 Tertio die egere consilio Romanus imperator; nam neque manere in iugo inopi neque regredi sine flagitio atque etiam periculo, si cedenti [5] ex superi-
8 oribus locis instaret [6] hostis, poterat; nec aliud restabat [7] quam audacter commissum pertinaci audacia, quae prudens interdum in exitu est, corrigere.
9 Ventum quidem erat eo ut, si hostem similem antiquis Macedonum regibus habuisset consul, magna clades

[1] concursum est; decrevissentque de summa belli, si loci Vahlen: concursum abellisin loci V: concursum ab utrisque esset illic, si loci Hartel: concursum esset insequenti die pugnatumque de summa belli, si loci Weissenborn.

[2] sed add. Vahlen: om. V.

[3] poterat. Pluribus Madvig: patere ad pluribus V.

bered for battle and the enemy were light troops, a B.C. 169 type very ready to stir up combat. Therefore immediately on meeting they discharged their weapons; many wounds were both received and inflicted by either side in the hasty encounter; small numbers of both forces were killed. Now that their spirits had been roused for the succeeding day, a more stubborn clash of larger forces occurred; and the decisive battle of the war would have been fought if there had been room enough to deploy the battle line; but the ridge of the mountain running up to a narrow peak barely allowed for a front of three files. And so while a few fought, the large remainder, especially the heavy-armed, stood by as onlookers of the battle. Light forces were also able to charge forward over the rolling slopes of the ridge and engage the opposing light forces in flanking attacks over terrain favourable and unfavourable. More had been wounded than killed that day when the battle was broken off at nightfall.

On the third day the Roman commander was at a loss; for he could neither remain on the ridge without supplies nor retire without disgrace and even danger, if the enemy pursued his retreat from the higher ground. There remained indeed no alternative to amending a bold undertaking by persistent boldness, which is occasionally wise in the long run. In fact, the position was such that, had the consul confronted an enemy like to the old-time kings of Macedonia, he

---

[4] ea V: eo Fraenkel.
[5] periculo, si cedenti Muretus: periculose cedenti V.
[6] instaret Muretus: stare V.
[7] restabat ed. Bas. 1535: stabat V: instabat Rossbach.

A.U.C. 585

accipi potuerit. Sed cum ad Dium per litora cum equitibus vagaretur rex et ab duodecim milibus prope clamorem et strepitum pugnantium audiret, nec auxit copias integros fessis summittendo neque ipse, 10 quod plurimum intererat, certamini adfuit, cum Romanus imperator, maior sexaginta annis et praegravis corpore, omnia militaria munera ipse impigre 11 obiret. Egregie ad ultimum in audaciter commisso perseveravit et Popilio relicto in custodia iugi per invia transgressurus praemissis,[1] qui[2] repurgarent iter, Attalum et Misagenem cum suae gentis utrumque auxiliaribus praesidio esse saltum aperientibus 12 iubet: ipse equites impedimentaque prae se habens cum legionibus agmen cogit.

V. Inenarrabilis labor descendentibus cum ruina iumentorum sarcinarumque. Progressis vixdum quattuor milia passuum nihil optabilius esse[3] quam 2 redire, qua venerant, si possent. Hostilem prope tumultum agmini elephanti praebebant, qui, ubi ad invia venerant, deiectis rectoribus cum horrendo stridore pavorem ingentem, equis maxime, incutie- 3 bant, donec traducendi eos ratio inita est. Per proclive sumpto fastigio longi duo validi asseres ex inferiore parte in terra defigebantur, distantes inter 4 se paulo plus quam quanta beluae[4] latitudo est; in [1] transgressurus praemissis Weissenborn: transgressus peremissis V.

[2] qui add. Fr: om. V.

[3] optabilius esse Fr: obtabilius esset V, quod servat Harant, ut vel fuit ut ante progressis addito.

[4] beluae Fr: ve V.

---

[1] This passage illustrates the strength of Livy's dramatic sense, and his weakness as a military commentator; but he had reason to point out the rashness of Marcius, who had once might have suffered a great disaster.[1] But though B.C. 169 the king was scouring the shore near Dium with cavalry, and at a distance of twelve miles could almost hear the shouts and din of the fighting men, he neither added to his forces by reinforcing his weary men with fresh troops, nor did he himself appear on the battle-field—a matter of greatest moment—although the Roman commander, aged over sixty and overburdened with flesh, performed vigorously in person all the duties of a soldier. Magnificently he pursued his bold undertaking to the end; he left Popilius to guard the ridge during his advance over pathless ground, sent ahead men to clear out a road, and ordered Attalus and Misagenes, each with the auxiliaries of his own nation, to act as guard for the men clearing the pass. The consul himself sent the cavalry and baggage ahead of him and brought up the rear with the legions.

V. The toil of the descent and the damage to baggage-animals and their loads cannot be put into words. After they had advanced a mere four miles, they would have given anything to return as they had come, if they but could. The confusion of an attack by an enemy was caused by the elephants, which on arriving at the pathless places cast off their mahouts and with horrible trumpetings caused a great panic, especially among the horses, until a plan was devised for getting them through. On the steep hillside the slope was marked off, and at the lower end two long strong posts were set in the ground, separated by a distance slightly greater than the width of one of the beasts; on a cross-beam laid

[1] been badly defeated by the Ligurians because he rushed into a narrow pass without reconnaissance (XXXIX. xx 5-10).

A.U.C. 585

eos transverso incumbente tigno asses[1] tricenos longi pedes, ut pons esset, iniungebantur humusque insuper iniciebatur. Modico deinde infra intervallo similis alter pons, dein tertius et plures ex ordine, qua rupes abscisae erant, fiebant. Solido procedebat[2] elephantus in pontem; cuius priusquam in extremum procederet,[3] succisis asseribus conlapsus pons usque ad[4] alterius initium pontis prolabi eum leniter cogebat. Alii elephanti pedibus insistentes, alii clunibus subsidentes prolabebantur. Ubi planities altera pontis excepisset eos, rursus simili ruina inferioris pontis deferebantur, donec ad aequiorem vallem perventum est.

Paulo plus septem milia eo die[5] Romani processerunt; minimum pedibus itineris confectum. Plerumque provolventes se simul cum armis aliisque oneribus cum omni genere vexationis processerunt, adeo ut[6] ne dux quidem et auctor itineris infitiaretur parva manu deleri omnem exercitum potuisse. Nocte ad modicam planitiem pervenerunt; nec quam infestus[7] is locus esset saeptus undique circumspiciendi spatium fuit vix tandem ex insperato stabilem ad insistendum nanctis locum. Postero quoque die in tam cava valle opperiri Popilium ac relictas cum eo

[1] asses Madvig: as V.
[2] procedebat J. F. Gronovius: praecedebat V.
[3] procederet Fr: cederet V: incederet Rossbach.
[4] ad add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[5] septem milia eo die J. F. Gronovius: vii die V.
[6] ut add. Fr: om. V.
[7] nec quam infestus Madvig: ne quā infectus V.

[1] As with Hannibal's use of vinegar for breaking rock (XXI. xxxvii. 2), this passage leaves several questions upon these posts, planks, each thirty feet long, were B.C. 169 fastened together to form a runway, and earth thrown on top of them.[1] Next, at a slight interval below, a second runway of the same sort was built, then a third, and others one after the other, where the cliffs were sheer. From firm ground an elephant would advance on to the runway; before he could proceed to its end, the posts were cut and the tilting of the runway forced the animal to slide gently to the head of the next runway. Some of the elephants would slide standing erect, others would squat on their haunches. Whenever they were met with the level expanse of another runway, they were again carried down by a like collapse of the lower structure, until they arrived at the more passable valley.

The Romans advanced on that day hardly more than seven miles. Very little of the journey did they accomplish on their feet. Usually they advanced by casting themselves down, arms, baggage, and all, while meeting with every kind of difficulty, so that even the leader who had chosen the route could not deny that a small force could have destroyed the whole army. By nightfall they reached a scant level area, nor did men who had unexpectedly at long last found a place which offered sure footing, have the leisure to observe the unfriendly nature of the place, hemmed in as it was on all sides. For the next day as well they were compelled to wait in the depths of this valley for Popilius and the troops left behind unanswered, including the question of whether it ever happened. We can say that either Livy or a copyist left out of the account of the runway a mention of the stringers which would be necessary; the "thirty-foot planks" somehow have replaced these stringers and the transverse planks which presumably would provide the flooring.

u.c. 585 copias necesse fuit; quos et ipsos, cum ab nulla parte hostis terruisset, locorum asperitas hostiliter vexavit.
11 Tertio die coniunctis copiis eunt per saltum, quem
12 incolae Callipeucen appellant. Quarto[1] inde die per aeque invia, sed adsuetudine peritius et meliore cum spe, quod nec hostis usquam[2] apparebat et mari adpropinquabant, degressi in campos inter Heracleum[3] et Libethrum posuerunt castra quorum pars 13 maior tumulos tenebat. Ibi pedes tendebat. Vallo campi[4] quoque partem, ubi eques tenderet, amplectebantur.

VI. Lavanti regi dicitur nuntiatum hostis adesse. Quo nuntio cum pavidus exiluisset e solio, victum se
2 sine proelio clamitans proripuit; et subinde per alia atque alia pavida consilia et imperia trepidans duos ex amicis, Pellam alterum, ut, quae ad Phacum[5] pecunia deposita erat, in mare proiceret, Thessalonicam alterum, ut navalia incenderet, misit: Asclepiodotum et Hippiam, quique cum iis erant,[6] ex praesidiis
3 revocat omnisque aditus aperit bello. ipse ab Dio auratis statuis omnibus raptis,[7] ne praeda hosti essent,
4 incolas eius loci demigrare[8] Pydnam cogit, et, quae

[1] Quarto Sigonius: tertio V.
[2] usquam Sigonius: umquam V.
[3] Heracleum J. F. Gronovius: Haracetum V.
[4] castra . . . campi H. J. Müller: castra peditum quorū pars maior tumulos tenebat ibi valle campi V.
[5] ut quae ad Phacum Madvig: usque ad Pathum V.
[6] in mare . . . cum iis erant add. Madvig, qui navalia scribens: ut navalia H. J. Müller: om. V.
[7] raptis Kreyssig: rapti V.
[8] incolas eius loci demigrare Kreyssig: in classe iustoci demigrasse V.

[1] The name (Fair Pines) suggests a forested area.

with him. These troops too, though threatened from B.C. 169 no direction by the enemy, were harassed as by an enemy by the ruggedness of the terrain. On the third day, they proceeded with the united forces through the pass called Callipeuce [1] by the natives. On the fourth day, they descended through country as pathless as before, but their skill was greater through practice, and their morale was higher, since the enemy had not showed himself anywhere and they were reaching the sea. On reaching the plains between Heracleum and Libethrum they pitched a camp, most of which occupied hills. This was the infantry camp; they embraced part of the plain too within the rampart, where the cavalry might encamp.

VI. The king was in his bath, they say, when the presence of the enemy was announced. At this message he leapt in terror from his tub and dashed out crying that he had been beaten without a battle. And thereafter, as his terror drove him to a succession of fear-struck plans and orders, he sent out two of his friends, one to Pella to cast into the sea the money stored in Phacus,[2] the other to Thessalonica to burn the dockyards. He recalled Asclepiodotus and Hippias and their forces from outpost duty and opened every approach for attack. The king ran off with all the gilded statues at Dium, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy, and compelled the inhabitants of that region to move to Pydna. Thereby

[2] The citadel of Pella, cf. below, x. 3; xlvi. 6; Polybius XXIX. 3 and XXXI. 17 (25); Diodorus XXX. 11. It is not clear why the treasure was thrown into the sea, and not simply dumped into the marshy lake which washed the walls of Phacus, but the recovery of most of the treasure by divers sounds as if it had been dumped on clean bottom.

A.U.C. 585

temeritas consulis videri potuisset, quod eo processisset, unde invito hoste regredi nequiret, eam non 5 inconsultam [1] audaciam fecit. Duos enim saltus, per quos inde evadere possent, habebant Romani, unum per Tempe in Thessaliam, alterum in Macedoniam praeter Dium; quae utraque regiis tenebantur
6 praesidiis. Itaque si sua intrepidus defendens [2] primam speciem adpropinquantis terroris sustinuisset, neque receptus Romanis per Tempe in Thessaliam neque commeatibus [3] pervehendis ea [4] patuisset iter.
7 Sunt enim Tempe saltus,[5] etiamsi non bello fiat
8 infestus, transitu difficilis. Nam praeter angustias per quinque milia, qua exiguum iumento onusto iter est, rupes utrimque ita abscisae sunt, ut despici vix sine vertigine quadam simul oculorum animique possit. Terret et sonitus et altitudo per mediam
9 vallem fluentis Penei amnis. Hic locus tam suapte natura infestus per quattuor distantia loca praesidiis
10 regiis [6] fuit insessus. Unum in primo aditu ad Gonnum erat, alterum in Condylo,[7] castello inexpug-
11 nabili, tertium circa Lapathunta, quem Characa appellant, quartum viae ipsi, qua et media et angustissima valles est, impositum, quam vel decem armatis
12 tueri facile est. Intercluso per Tempe simul aditu

[1] inconsultam Sigonius: consultam V.
[2] itaque si sua intrepidus defendens H. J. Müller: itque si dua intrepidus x dies V: itaque si paucos intrepidus rex dies Madvig: itaque si rex intrepidus Dium defendens Koch.
[3] neque receptus . . . commeatibus Fr: neq. receptus Romanus partem in Tessaliam nequer commeatibus V.
[4] ea Madvig: eo V.
[5] sunt enim Tempe saltus Fr: sunt enimp. saltus V.
[6] regiis J. F. Gronovius: regis V.
[7] in Condylo Drakenborch; Condylon V.

what might have seemed the rashness of the consul B.C. 169 in advancing to a position from which he could not retire without the consent of the enemy, was turned by the king into well-calculated boldness. For the Romans had two passes by which they could extricate themselves: one through Tempe into Thessaly, the other into Macedonia past Dium. Both of the passes were being held by the king's forces; therefore if the king, by fearlessly holding his own, had resisted the first false appearance of approaching danger, he would have left the Romans no retreat through Tempe to Thessaly, nor any route for bringing up provisions from that direction.[1] For even without the opposition of an enemy Tempe is a defile difficult of passage; for besides five miles of narrows through which the road is cramped for a loaded animal, the cliffs on either side are so sheer that one can hardly look down without some dizziness of eye and brain. An additional source of fear is the roar and depth of the Peneüs River flowing through the midst of the canyon. This place, so unfriendly by its very nature, was blocked at four separate points by the king's garrisons. One was at the very entrance near Gonnus, the second at Condylus, an impregnable fort, the third in the vicinity of Lapathus, which they call the Palisade, the fourth set by the road itself where the canyon, in the middle of its course, is at its narrowest, where it can easily be defended by no more than ten soldiers. If the Romans' access to [1] Livy neglects the possibility of supply by sea, on which the consul seems to have relied, see below, vii. 10; this is probably due to the characteristic preoccupation of a Roman with the land, though one must admit that the passage above cited shows that the fleet was badly handled, and the coast presumably was difficult, cf. below, xlii. 5–6.

A.U.C. 585

commeatibus, simul reditu ipsis,[1] montes, per quos 13 descenderant, repetendi erant. Quod, ut furto fefellerant, ita propalam tenentibus superiora cacu-mina hostibus non poterant: et experta difficultas 14 spem omnem incidisset. Supererat nihil aliud in temere commisso quam in Macedoniam ad Dium per medios evadere hostis; quod, nisi di mentem regi ademissent,[2] et [3] ipsum ingentis difficultatis erat.
15 Nam cum Olympi radices montis paulo plus quam mille passuum ad mare relinquant spatium, cuius dimidium loci occupat ostium late restagnans
Baphyri amnis, partem planitiae aut Iovis templum 16 aut oppidum tenet, reliquum perexiguum fossa modica valloque claudi poterat, et saxorum [4] ad manum silvestrisque materiae tantum erat, ut vel 17 murus obici turresque excitari potuerint. Quorum nihil cum dispexisset caecata mens subito terrore, nudatis omnibus praesidiis patefactisque bello cunctis aditibus Pydnam [5] refugit.

VII. Consul plurimum et praesidii et spei cernens in stultitia et segnitia hostis, remisso nuntio ad Sp. Lucretium Larisam, ut castella relicta ab hoste circa Tempe occuparet, praemisso Popilio ad explorandos transitus circa Dium, postquam patere omnia in 2 omnis partes animadvertit, secundis castris pervenit

[1] ipsis Madvig: ipsi V.
[2] di mentem regi ademissent Fr: di moventem regiam demissent V.
[3] et add. Büttner: om. V.
[4] saxorum ed. Bas. 1535: Thessalorum V.
[5] patefactisque bello cunctis aditibus Pydnam Vahlen: patefactisquae bello factis ad dypylam V.

[1] For this famous temple, cf. Polybius IV. 62.
[2] On this section, cf. Polybius XXVIII. 10. 11 (9a. 12) Lucretius had been praetor in 172 B.C., cf. XLII. ix. 8.

supplies through Tempe, as well as their line of retreat, had been cut off, they would have had to return to the mountains through which they had descended. As they had deceived the enemy in this by stealth, they could not duplicate the feat without concealment and while the enemy were in possession of the higher summits; and the difficulty they had undergone would have laid low all hope. There was no alternative left in this rash enterprise but to get out into Macedonia past Dium in the teeth of the enemy, and this undertaking, had not the gods deprived the king of his wits, would itself have been of the utmost difficulty. For between the foothills of Mount Olympus and the sea lies an interval of a little more than a mile, half of which space is taken up with the broad estuary of the Baphyrus River, while part of the plain is obstructed by either the temple of Jupiter [1] or the town. The very small remainder could have been barred off by a ditch of no extravagant size and a palisade, and there was such an abundance of stone and of forest timber at hand that even a wall could have been thrown up and towers erected. Since none of these possibilities revealed themselves to a mind blinded by sudden panic, the king stripped away all his defences and opened every approach to assault before taking refuge in Pydna. B.C. 169

VII. The consul sighted much security as well as hope in the folly and inaction of the king; he sent back a message to Spurius Lucretius [2] at Larisa to seize the forts abandoned by the enemy in the region of Tempe, and sending Popilius to reconnoitre the crossings around Dium, arrived at that city in two days' march, since he learned that everything lay open in all directions. He ordered his camp to be ad Dium metarique sub ipso templo, ne quid sacro in 3 loco violaretur, iussit. Ipse urbem ingressus, sicut non magnam, ita exornatam publicis locis et multitu-dine statuarum munitamque egregie, vix satis credere in tantis rebus sine causa relictis non aliquem subesse 4 dolum. Unum diem ad exploranda circa omnia moratus castra movet; satisque credens in Pieria [1] frumenti copiam fore, eo die ad amnem nomine

A.U.C. 585

5 Mityn processit. Postero die progressus Agassas [2] urbem tradentibus sese ipsis recepit; et ut reliquorum Macedonum animos sibi conciliaret, obsidibus contentus sine praesidio relinquere se iis urbem immunesque ac suis legibus victuros est pollicitus.
6 Progressus inde diei iter ad Ascordum flumen posuit castra; et quantum procederet longius a Thessalia, 7 eo maiorem rerum omnium inopiam sentiens, regres-sus ad Dium est dubitatione omnibus exempta, quid intercluso ab Thessalia patiendum fuisset, cui procul inde abscedere tutum non esset.
8 Perseus coactis [3] in unum omnibus copiis ducibusque increpare praefectos praesidiorum, ante 9 omnes Asclepiodotum atque Hippiam; ab his dicere claustra Macedoniae tradita Romanis esse; cuius culpae reus nemo iustius quam ipse fuisset.
10 Consuli postquam ex alto conspecta classis spem fecit cum commeatu naves venire—ingens enim

[1] in Pieria Kreyssig: imperia V: ita et infra, viii. 3.
[2] Agassas J. F. Gronovius: acassam V.
[3] coactis Weissenborn: peractis V.

[1] Among these statues were the portraits by Lysippus of the twenty-five Cavalry Companions killed at the battle of the Granicus, cf. Arrian, Anabasis I. 16. 4.

pitched next to the temple itself, so that no sacrilege B.C. 169 against the sacred precinct might be committed. On personally inspecting the city which, though not large, was adorned with public installations and an abundance of statues [1] and was magnificently fortified, the consul could hardly convince himself that no ruse lurked in the unreasonable abandonment of such remarkable objects. After a day's delay for general reconnaissance all around, he advanced, and being convinced that there would be abundant grain in Pieria, he proceeded on that day to a river named Mitys. Continuing on the following day, he accepted the surrender of the city of Agassae by its inhabitants; and to win over the hearts of the other Macedonians, he contented himself with hostages and promised to leave the city to its people without garrison, and to accord them autonomy and freedom from tribute. Advancing thence a day's journey, he encamped by the Ascordus River. Because he felt more strongly the want of every sort of supplies the further he advanced from Thessaly, he retired to Dium, thereby demonstrating beyond a doubt to everyone what he would have suffered had he been cut off from Thessaly, since he found it unsafe to advance far from there.

After Perseus had assembled all his forces and officers, he blamed the commanders of his outposts, above all Asclepiodotus and Hippias; they, he said, had surrendered the keys to Macedonia to the Romans—a crime for which no one would have been more justly prosecuted than himself.

After the sight of the Roman fleet at sea had brought to the consul hope that the ships were bringing provisions—for there was a great scarcity of grain and almost a famine—he heard from the men just

A.U.C. 585

caritas annonae ac prope inopia erat—ab invectis iam portum audit onerarias naves Magnesiae relictas
11 esse. Incerto inde quidnam agendum foret—adeo sine ulla ope hostis, quae adgravaret, cum ipsa difficultate rerum pugnandum erat—peropportune 12 litterae a Sp. Lucretio adlatae sunt castella se, quae super Tempe essent et circa Philan, tenere omnia frumentique in iis et aliarum in usum rerum copiam invenisse.

VIII. His magno opere laetus consul ab Dio ad Philan ducit, simul ut praesidium eius firmaret, simul ut militi frumentum, cuius tarda subvectio erat,
2 divideret. Ea profectio famam haudquaquam secundam habuit. Nam alii metu recessisse eum ab hoste ferebant quia manenti in Pieria proelio dimi-
3 candum foret, alii ignarum belli quae in dies fortuna novaret, ut opperientibus sese rebus, emisisse [1] de
4 manibus ea quae mox repeti non possent. Simul enim cessit possessione Dii, excitavit hostem, ut tunc sentiret recuperanda esse quae prius culpa
5 amissa forent. Audita enim profectione consulis regressus Dium, quae disiecta ac vastata ab Romanis erant, reficit, pinnas moenium decussas reponit, ab omni parte muros firmat; deinde quinque milia passuum ab urbe citra ripam Elpei amnis [2] castra ponit, amnem ipsum transitu perdifficilem pro
6 munimento habiturus. Fluit ex valle Olympi montis, aestate exiguus, hibernis idem incitatus pluviis et

[1] rebus emisisse Kreyssig: reb. omisisse V.
[2] ripam Elpei amnis Madvig: ripam enipi añis V.

come into port that the freight ships had been left B.C. 169 in Magnesia. As the consul was debating what should be done—so completely was his struggle directed against the mere difficulty of the situation, without the slightest effort on the part of the enemy to make matters worse—in the nick of time a despatch arrived from Spurius Lucretius that he was in possession of the forts above Tempe and around Phila, and that he had found a supply of grain and other useful materials in them.

VIII. Greatly pleased by this news, the consul moved from Dium to Phila, both to strengthen its garrison and to distribute to the soldiers the grain, transportation of which was slow. This march started unpleasant rumours; for some put it that he had retired from before the enemy out of fear, because he would have had to fight a battle if he had remained in Pieria, while others said that in his ignorance of the daily fluctuations in the fortunes of war, and as if events were awaiting his signal, he had dropped from his grasp advantages which presently could not be recovered. For at one move he had lost his grip on Dium and had stirred up the enemy to perceiving at long last that he must recover what previously he had shamefully lost. For on hearing of the departure of the consul, the king returned to Dium, rebuilt what had been cast down and despoiled by the Romans, replaced the battlements knocked off the walls, and strengthened the walls all around. Then he placed his camp five miles from the city on the nearer bank of the Elpeüs River, intending to use the river itself as a fortification since it was very hard to cross. It flows from a ravine of Mount Olympus, is scanty in summer, but again in supra rupes ingentis gurgites facit et infra prorutam [1] in mare evolvendo terram praealtas voragines cava- 7 toque medio alveo ripas utrimque praecipitis. Hoc flumine saeptum iter hostis [2] credens extrahere reliquum tempus aestatis in animo habebat.

A.U.C. 585

8 Inter haec consul a Phila Popilium cum duobus 9 milibus armatorum Heracleum [3] mittit. Abest a Phila quinque milia ferme passuum, media regione inter Dium Tempeque in rupe amni imminente positum.

IX. Popilius priusquam armatos muris admoveret, misit qui magistratibus principibusque suaderent, fidem clementiamque Romanorum quam vim experiri 2 mallent. Nihil ea consilia moverunt, quia ignes ad Elpeum [4] ex regiis castris apparebant. Tum terra marique—et classis adpulsa ab litore stabat—simul armis, simul operibus machinisque oppugnari coepti.

3 Iuvenes etiam quidam Romani ludicro circensi ad usum belli verso partem humillimam muri ceperunt.

4 Mos erat tum, nondum hac effusione inducta bestiis omnium gentium circum complendi, varia spectaculorum conquirere genera: nam semel quadrigis, semel desultore misso vix unius horae tempus

5 utrumque curriculum complebat. Inter cetera sexageni ferme iuvenes, interdum plures appa-

[1] infra prorutam J. F. Gronovius: intrapororupta V.

[2] hoc flumine saeptum iter hostis Novák: hoc flumine et sospitem se et saeptum iter hostis Gitlbauer: hoc flumine hospes et septum iter hostis V.

[3] Heracleum J. F. Gronovius: Heraclea V: sic et ad ix. 10 et x. 5.

[4] Elpeum Madvig: elipeum V.

---

[1] Livy notes the beginnings of lavishness in shows as early as 186 B.C., see XXXIX. xxii. 2, XLI. xxvii. 6, and below, xviii. 8.

winter is swollen by rains; it forms great rapids above its boulders, and below, by carrying off the eroded earth to the sea, produces great abysses and banks sheer on either side above a deeply-hollowed channel. Thinking that the enemy's advance was barred by this river, the king intended to use up the rest of the summer. B.C. 169

Meanwhile the consul sent Popilius with two thousand soldiers from Phila to Heracleum. This is about five miles from Phila, on a cliff overhanging the river midway between Dium and Tempe.

IX. Before Popilius brought his men against the walls, he sent envoys to persuade the magistrates and chief citizens to prefer making trial of the good faith and mildness of the Romans rather than of their force. This advice availed nothing, because the fires of the king's camp at the Elpeüs were in sight. Then the siege began, both with assaults and with field-works and engines, both from land and sea, for the fleet, too, had arrived and occupied the shore side.

The younger Romans even captured the lowest part of the wall by turning to military use a performance of the arena. It was the custom then, before there had been introduced the present extravagance [1] of cramming the arena with animals from all over the earth, to hunt out various sorts of spectacles, for one race with four-horse chariots and one with bareback riders hardly occupied the space of an hour for the two events. As one of these performances, groups of about sixty [2] youths (occasionally more at more

[2] Sixty was the usual number of soldiers in the so-called "century."

A.U.C. 585

ratioribus ludis,[1] armati inducebantur. Horum inductio ex parte simulacrum decurrentis exercitus erat, ex parte elegantioris quam[2] militaris artis
6 propiorque gladiatorium armorum usum. Cum alios decursu edidissent motus, quadrato agmine facto, scutis super capita densatis, stantibus primis, secundis summissioribus, tertiis magis et quartis, postremis etiam genu nixis, fastigatam, sicut tecta aedificiorum
7 sunt, testudinem faciebant. Hinc quinquaginta ferme pedum spatio distantes duo armati procurrebant comminatique inter se, ad ima in summam testudinem per densata scuta cum evasissent, nunc velut propugnantes per oras extremae testudinis, nunc in media inter se concurrentes, haud secus quam stabili solo persultabant.
8 Huic testudo similis humillimae parti[3] muri admota. Cum armati superstantes subissent, propugnatoribus muri fastigio altitudinis aequabantur; depulsisque iis in urbem duorum signorum milites
9 transcenderunt. Id tantum dissimile fuit, quod et in fronte extremi et ex lateribus soli non habebant super capita elata scuta, ne nudarent corpora, sed praetenta[4] pugnantium more. Ita nec ipsos tela ex muro missa subeuntis laeserunt et testudini iniecta imbris

[1] apparatioribus ludis Muretus: apparitoribus ludi V.
[2] elegantioris quam Kreyssig: elegantioris exercitus quam V.
[3] similis humillimae parti Madvig: simillime parti V.
[4] praetenta Latinius: proiecta Heraeus: praetecta V.

elaborate games) entered under arms. Their entrance was in some respects an imitation of military manoeuvres, but in other respects was of a style more showy than the military and more akin to the fashion of gladiatorial combats. After passing through various evolutions in this manoeuvre, they would form in ranks, with shields close-set over their heads, the front rank erect, the second somewhat stooped, the third and fourth more so, and the rear rank down on their knees, so that they would form a "tortoise" sloped like the roof of a house. Next two armed men, separated by an interval of some fifty feet, would rush out, feint at each other, and mount from bottom to top of the "tortoise" over the close-set shields. They would then act as if skirmishing at the outer edges of the "tortoise," now clash with each other in the centre, and leap about just as if they were on solid ground. B.C. 169

A "tortoise" like this was brought up to the lowest part of the wall. When soldiers on top came up to the wall, they were at their highest elevation level with the defenders of the wall; the defenders were routed and the soldiers of two maniples[1] crossed into the city. The only difference from the show was that the front rank and those exposed on the flanks did not raise their shields over their heads, but held them out in the usual position for battle in order not to expose their bodies. In this way the missiles hurled from the wall did not injure the men as they approached and those cast on the "tortoise"

[1] Polybius (XXVIII. 11 (12)) says that a third maniple formed the "tortoise." Cf. Ammianus Marcellinus XXVI. 8. 9 for a similar formation.

A.U.C. 585

in modum lubrico fastigio innoxia ad imum labebantur.

10 Et consul capto iam Heracleo castra eo promovit, tamquam [1] Dium atque inde summoto rege in Pieriam
11 etiam progressurus. Sed hiberna iam praeparans vias commeatibus subvehendis ex Thessalia muniri iubet et eligi horreis opportuna loca tectaque aedificari, ubi deversari portantes commeatus possent.

X. Perseus tandem a [2] pavore eo, quo attonitus fuerat, recepto animo malle imperiis suis non obtemperatum esse, cum trepidans gazam in mare deici
2 Pellae, Thessalonicae navalia iusserat incendi. Andronicus Thessalonicam missus traxerat tempus, id ipsum quod accidit, paenitentiae relinquens locum.
3 Incautior Nicias Pellae proiciendo pecuniae partem
4 quae fuerat ad Phacum [3]; sed in re emendabili [4] visus lapsus esse, quod per urinatores omnis ferme extracta est. Tantusque pudor regi pavoris eius fuit ut urinatores clam interfici iusserit, deinde Andronicum quoque et Nician, ne quis tam dementis imperii conscius existeret.

5 Inter haec C. Marcius cum classe ab Heracleo Thessalonicam profectus et agrum pluribus locis expositis per litora armatis late vastavit et procurrentes ab urbe secundis aliquot proeliis trepidos
6 intra moenia compulit. Iamque ipsi urbi terribilis

[1] eo promovit, tamquam Fr: eo pervictam quam V.

[2] a add. Sigonius: om. V.

[3] proiciendo pecuniae partem, quae fuerat ad Phacum Madvig: priociendae pecuniae partem quidem fuderat in altum M. Müller: proiciendae pecuniae partem quod iecerat in altum Harant: proiciendae pecuniae partem quod fuerat natum V.

[4] in re emendabili Drakenborch: in rem emendabilem V.

slid harmlessly like rain down to the bottom of the slippery slope. B.C. 169

On capturing Heracleum, the consul advanced his camp there, as if he were going to advance to Dium and thence, after dislodging the king, into Pieria as well. But as he was already making ready for wintering, he ordered the roads from Thessaly to be repaired for the transport of provisions and suitable sites for granaries to be chosen and houses built where those transporting the provisions could lodge.

X. Perseus at length recovered his courage from the panic which had struck him down, and would have preferred that his commands had not been obeyed when he ordered the treasure at Pella to be cast into the sea and the dockyards at Thessalonica to be burned. Andronicus, the envoy to Thessalonica, had killed time to allow for the very thing which happened, a change of mind.[1] Nicias at Pella was less wary in casting away part of the money which was in Phacus, but he seemed to have made his mistake in a manner not irreparable, since almost all the money was brought up by divers. So great was the king's shame at this panic of his that he ordered the divers secretly to be put to death, and after them Andronicus and Nicias, too, so that there should be no one having knowledge of so crazy an order.

Meanwhile, Gaius Marcius set out with the fleet from Heracleum for Thessalonica, ravaged the countryside far and wide by setting ashore forces at several points, and in several successful battles drove back those who sallied from the city headlong within their walls. He was striking terror into the city itself, when [1] Andronicus is accused by Diodorus XXX. 11 of working in this matter for a Roman victory.

A.U.C. 585

erat, cum dispositis omnis generis tormentis non vagi modo circa muros temere adpropinquantes, sed etiam qui in navibus erant, saxis tormento emicanti-
7 bus percutiebantur. Revocatis igitur in naves militibus omissaque Thessalonicae oppugnatione Aeniam inde petunt. Quindecim milia passuum ea urbs
8 abest, adversus Pydnam posita, fertilis agro. Pervastatis finibus eius legentes oram Antigoneam perveniunt. Ibi egressi in terram primo et vastarunt agros passim et aliquantum praedae contulerunt ad
9 naves. Dein palatos eos adorti Macedones, mixti pedites equitesque, fugientes effuse ad mare persecuti quingentos [1] ferme occiderunt et non minus ceperunt.
10 Nec aliud quam ultima necessitas, cum recipere se tuto ad naves prohiberentur, animos militum Romanorum simul desperatione alia salutis simul in-
11 dignitate irritavit. Redintegrata in litore pugna est: adiuvere [2] qui in navibus erant. Ibi Macedonum ducenti ferme caesi, par numerus captus. Ab Antigonea classis profecta ad agrum Pallenensem 12 escensionem ad populandum fecit. Finium is ager Cassandrensium erat, longe fertilissimus omnis orae quam praetervecti fuerant. Ibi Eumenes rex viginti tectis navibus ab Elaea profectus obvius fuit et quinque missae a Prusia rege tectae naves.

XI. Hac virium accessione animus crevit praetori,
2 ut Cassandream oppugnaret. Condita est a Cas-

[1] persecuti quingentos edd.: persecutia V.
[2] est; adiuvere Kreyssig: estatinae V.

---

[1] Established about 300 B.C. on the site of Potidaea, which had been destroyed by Philip II in 356 B.C.
[2] The port of Pergamum, east by south of Lesbos.

from the engines of all types which were distributed B.C. 169 about, stones shot by machine struck down not only the skirmishers about the walls who rashly approached, but even the men in the ships. Recalling the soldiers to the ships and abandoning the siege of Thessalonica, they made thence for Aenea. This city is fifteen miles away, set opposite Pydna in fertile land. After devastating its territory they followed the shore and arrived at Antigonea. There they disembarked and for a time both ravaged the fields round about and carried some booty off to their ships. Then the Macedonians, cavalry and infantry together, attacked the scattered raiders and pursuing as they fled in disorder, killed about five hundred and captured as many. Nothing but utter necessity, when they were kept from finding safety in their ships, aroused the spirits of the Roman soldiers, both by despair of other means of safety and by indignation. The fight was renewed on the shore; those aboard the ships came to the rescue. Here about two hundred of the Macedonians were slain and an equal number captured. From Antigonea the fleet sailed to the peninsula of Pallene and landed troops to ravage it. This land belonged to the territory of Cassandrea [1] and was by far the most fertile of all the coast they had passed. Here they were met by King Eumenes, who had set out from Elaea [2] with twenty decked [3] ships, as well as by five decked ships sent by King Prusias.[4]

XI. With this accession of strength, the praetor's spirits rose to the point of attacking Cassandrea.

[3] According to Nissen, the use of this word indicates that Livy is following Polybius here.

[4] He was hedging on his neutrality of 171 B.C., cf. XLII. xxix. 3.

A.U.C. 585

sandro rege in ipsis faucibus, quae Pallenensem agrum ceterae Macedoniae iungunt, hinc Toronaico, hinc
3 Macedonico saepta mari. Eminet [1] namque in altum lingua in qua sita est, nec minus quam inclitus [2] magnitudine Atho mons excurrit, obversa in regionem Magnesiae duobus imparibus promunturiis, quorum maiori Posideum est nomen, minori Canastraeum.
4 Divisis partibus oppugnare adorti. Romanus ad Clitas, quas vocant, munimenta, cervis etiam obiectis, ut viam intercluderet, a Macedonico ad Toronaicum mare perducit. Ab altera parte euripus est; inde
5 Eumenes oppugnabat. Romanis in fossa complenda quam nuper obiecerat Perseus, plurimum erat laboris. Ibi quaerenti praetori, quia nusquam cumuli apparebant quo regesta e fossa terra foret, monstrati sunt fornices: non ad eandem crassitudinem, qua veterem murum, sed simplici laterum
6 ordine structos esse. Consilium igitur cepit transfosso pariete iter in urbem patefacere. Fallere autem ita se posse, si muros a parte alia scalis adortus tumultu iniecto in custodiam eius loci propugnatores urbis avertisset.

[1] saepta mari eminet Fr: saeptā meminent V.
[2] inclitus Kreyssig: elatus Hartel: insignis Novák: inaltus V, cf. in altum supra.

[1] Livy's description is confusing; Posideum, the westward promontory, is no more than a spur on the side of the main peninsula, of which Canastraeum forms the tip, extending to the south-east; the slimness of this tip induced Livy or his source to call it the smaller.
[2] Perhaps a moat open at one end to the sea.

This was founded by King Cassander precisely in the B.C. 169 narrows which connect the peninsula of Pallene with the rest of Macedonia and are bounded on the one side by the Gulf of Macedonia, and on the other by that of Torone. For the peninsula on which this city is situated rises high and projects into the sea quite as far as Mount Athos, which is noted for its size; it forms, opposite to the district of Magnesia, two unequal promontories, the larger named Posideum and the smaller Canastraeum.[1]

The siege was begun in separate divisions. The Roman commander constructed works, including chevaux-de-frise, extending from the Macedonian to the Toronaic gulf, in the quarter called Clitae, in order to cut off the highway. On the other side is a narrow strait [2]; there Eumenes was attacking. The Romans found that their greatest task was filling the moat which Perseus had lately built as a defence. When the praetor inquired why there were no mounds to be seen, where the earth dug from the moat would be, he was shown certain arches.[3] These, he heard, were built up not to the same strength as the old wall, but only to the thickness of a single brick. He therefore adopted the plan of opening a path into the city by piercing the brickwork. He further expected to effect surprise in this move if he attacked the walls elsewhere with scaling ladders and, by raising confusion, drew off the defenders of the city to the protection of this second spot.

[3] These arches were probably intended as sally-ports, cf. XXXVI. xxiii. 3; it is not so clear what they had to do with the absence of soil from the moat—whether the bricks had been made from the soil, or whether the latter had been taken within the walls through the arches for disposal, before the brick curtains were built.

A.U.C. 555

7 Erant in praesidio Cassandreae [1] praeter non contemnendam iuventutem oppidanorum octingenti Agrianes et duo milia Penestarum Illyriorum a Pleurato inde missi, bellicosum utrumque genus. 8 His tuentibus muros, cum subire Romani summa vi niterentur, momento temporis parietes fornicum perfossi urbem patefecerunt. Quod si qui inrum- 9 perent armati [2] fuissent, extemplo cepissent. Hoc ubi perfectum esse opus militibus nuntiatum est, clamorem alacres gaudio repente tollunt, alii parte alia in urbem inrupturi.[3]

XII. Hostis primum admiratio cepit quidnam sibi 2 repentinus clamor vellet. Postquam patere urbem accepere praefecti praesidii Pytho et Philippus, pro eo qui occupasset adgredi opus factum esse rati, cum valida manu Agrianum Illyriorumque erumpunt 3 Romanosque, qui alii aliunde coibant convocabanturque, ut signa in urbem inferrent, incompositos atque inordinatos fugant persequunturque ad fossam, in quam compulsos ruina cumulant. Sescenti ferme ibi interfecti, omnesque prope qui inter murum fossam- 4 que deprensi erant volnerantur. Ita suo ipse conatu perculsus praetor segnior ad alia factus consilia erat. Et ne Eumeni quidem simul a mari simul a terra

[1] Cassandreae Fr: cas (ad finem lineae) V.
[2] qui inrumperent armati I. Perizonius: qui inrupere inarmati V.
[3] alii parte alia in urbem inrupturi J. F. Gronovius: aliis parte alia in urbem inrupturum V.

[1] Cf. XLII. li. 5 and the note.

In the garrison of Cassandrea there were, besides B.C. 169 a respectable contingent of young citizens, eight hundred Agrianes [1] and two thousand Illyrian Penestae [2] sent from their home by Pleuratus—both peoples being good fighters. They were defending the walls as the Romans struggled with the utmost energy to mount them, when the piercing of the brickwork of the arches in the twinkling of an eye, laid open the city. If men had been there to dash in armed, they would have taken the town at once. When the accomplishment of this breakthrough was reported to the Roman soldiers, they at once eagerly raised a shout of joy, expecting to burst into the city at several points.

XII. The enemy were first struck with wonder as to the meaning of this sudden uproar. After the commanders of the garrison, Pytho and Philip, had been informed that the city lay open, they considered that the work had been done for the benefit of the side first to press the attack, and made a sally with a strong force of Agrianes and Illyrians. The Romans, who were coming up and being summoned from various points to advance into the city, were routed in their scattered and unorganized state and chased to the moat, into which they were driven and which they filled with the fallen. About six hundred were killed there and almost to a man those caught between the wall and the moat were wounded. The praetor, being so grievously dashed by his own undertaking, had become less eager to form other plans. Not even Eumenes, who was attacking both by sea

[2] These Illyrians were mentioned in XLIII. xxiii. 7; Pleuratus, who sent them, is possibly the exile mentioned in XLIII. xix. 13 as serving with Perseus.

A.U.C. 585

5 adgredienti quidquam satis procedebat. Placuit igitur utrique custodiis firmatis ne quod praesidium ex Macedonia intromitti posset, quoniam vis aperta
6 non processisset, operibus moenia oppugnare. Haec parantibus iis decem [1] regii lembi ab Thessalonica cum delectis Gallorum auxiliaribus missi, cum in salo stantes hostium [2] naves conspexissent, ipsi obscura nocte, simplici ordine, quam poterant proxime litus
7 tenentes, intrarunt urbem. Huius novi praesidii fama absistere oppugnatione simul Romanos regemque coegit. Circumvecti promunturium ad Toronen
8 classem appulerunt. Eam quoque oppugnare adorti, ubi valida defendi manu animadverterunt, inrito incepto Demetriadem petunt. Ibi cum adpropinquantes repleta moenia armatis vidissent, praetervecti ad Iolcon classem appulerunt, inde agro vastato Demetriadem quoque adgressuri.

XIII. Inter haec et consul, ne segnis sederet tantum in agro hostium, M. Popilium cum quinque milibus militum ad Meliboeam urbem oppugnandam
2 mittit. Sita est in radicibus Ossae montis, qua parte in Thessaliam vergit, opportune imminens super
3 Demetriadem. Primus adventus hostium perculit incolas loci: collectis deinde ab [3] necopinato pavore animis discurrunt armati ad portas ac moenia, qua suspecti aditus erant, spemque extemplo inciderunt
4 capi primo impetu posse. Obsidio igitur parabatur, et opera ad [4] oppugnationem fieri coepta.

[1] iis decem Wesenberg: his x V.
[2] hostium Fügner: hos V.
[3] ab add. Novák: om. V. [4] ad add. Vahlen: om. V.

[1] The threat to Demetrias must have consisted in cutting its line of communications, since Meliboea is twenty-five miles away, air-line.

and land, gained any worth-while advantage. Both B.C.169 commanders therefore determined to strengthen the forces on guard, so that no reinforcement from Macedonia might be sent in, and since open assault was unsuccessful, to attack the fortifications with siege-works. During the preparation of these works, ten Macedonian scout-ships, sent from Thessalonica with picked Gallic auxiliaries, saw that the besieging ships were anchored out to sea, and in the dead of night, in single column, hugging the shore as closely as possible, entered the city. Report of this new defence force compelled both the Romans and the king to abandon the siege. They sailed around the cape and put in near Torone. After attempting to besiege this city too, and observing that it was defended by a strong force, they gave up their undertaking, and made for Demetrias. On approaching it they saw the walls filled with armed men, and sailed past to make a landing at Iolcus, planning to ravage the fields and then attack Demetrias too.

XIII. Meanwhile the consul, for his part, in order not merely to remain sluggishly idle in hostile territory, sent Marcus Popilius with five thousand soldiers to assail the city of Meliboea. This is situated in the foothills of Mount Ossa, on the side sloping toward Thessaly, and conveniently threatening Demetrias.[1] The first arrival of the enemy dismayed the inhabitants of the place; then, after rallying their spirits from the unexpected fright, they ran under arms to their posts at gates and wall, where the expected lines of attack were, and at once dispelled the hope that the town could be taken at the first rush. Preparations for a siege were therefore made and the construction of works for the assault was begun.

A.U.C. 585 Perseus cum audisset simul Meliboeam a consulis exercitu oppugnari, simul classem Iolci [1] stare, ut [2] inde Demetriadem adgrederetur, Euphranorem quendam ex ducibus cum delectis duobus milibus Meli- 5 boeam mittit. Eidem imperatum, ut si a Meliboea summovisset Romanos, Demetriadem prius occulto itinere intraret, quam ab Iolco ad urbem castra 6 moverent Romani. Et ab oppugnatoribus Meliboeae, cum in superioribus locis repente apparuisset, cum trepidatione multa relicta opera sunt ignisque [3] 7 iniectus. Ita a Meliboea abscessum est. Euphranor soluta unius urbis obsidione Demetriadem extemplo ducit. Nocte moenia intrat tantamque fiduciam incolentibus fecit ut non moenia [4] modo, sed agros etiam confiderent se a populationibus tueri posse; et eruptiones [5] in vagos populatores non sine volneri- 8 bus hostium factae sunt. Circumvecti tamen moenia sunt praetor et rex, situm urbis contemplantes, si qua 9 parte temptare aut opere aut vi possent. Fama fuit per Cydantem Cretensem et Antimachum, qui Demetriadi praeerat, tractatas inter Eumenen et Persea condiciones amicitiae. Ab Demetriade certe absces- 10 sum est. Eumenes ad consulem navigat; gratulatusque,[6] quod prospere Macedoniam intrasset, 11 Pergamum in regnum abit. Marcius Figulus praetor parte classis in hiberna Sciathum missa cum reliquis navibus Oreum Euboeae [7] petit, eam urbem aptissi-

[1] Iolci Fr: loci V.
[2] ut add. Fr: om. V.
[3] ignisque add. Fr: om. V.
[4] intrat tantamque fiduciam incolentibus fecit ut non moenia add. Forchhammer: nocte muenia modo V.
[5] eruptiones Fr: eruditionibus V.
[6] gratulatusque Drakenborch: gratulatus V.
[7] Oreum Euboeae J. F. Gronovius: oreumboetiae V.

When Perseus heard that Meliboea was being B.C. 169 attacked by the consul's army at the same time that the fleet was anchored at Iolcus, in order to attack Demetrias from there, he sent a certain Euphranor, one of his officers, with two thousand picked soldiers to Meliboea. Euphranor's orders were that if he dislodged the Romans from Meliboea, he was to enter Demetrias unobserved before the Romans brought their camp up to the city from Iolcus. The besiegers of Meliboea, in great panic when Euphranor suddenly made his appearance on higher ground, abandoned their works and set them afire. So the siege of Meliboea was given up. After freeing one city from siege, Euphranor at once advanced to Demetrias. He entered the walls by night and gave the inhabitants such confidence that they felt sure of their ability not only to defend their walls, but to protect their land from raids. Sallies were made against the scattered ravagers, not without casualties to the enemy. However, the praetor and the king rode around the walls, reconnoitring the situation of the city, in case they could attempt an assault by works or by main force at any point. There was a rumour that Cydas the Cretan [1] and Antimachus, the commander in Demetrias, were agents in discussing terms of friendship between Eumenes and Perseus. At any rate, the Romans departed from Demetrias. Eumenes sailed to the consul, and after offering congratulations on his successful entrance into Macedonia, left for Pergamum in his own kingdom. The praetor Marcius Figulus sent part of his fleet into winter quarters at Sciathus, and made for Oreüs in [1] A substantial account of this and other intrigues is given by Polybius XXIX. 6 (1c).

A.U.C. 585

mam ratus unde exercitibus qui in Macedonia quique in Thessalia erant, mitti commeatus possent.

12 De Eumene rege longe diversa tradunt. Si Valerio Antiati credas, nec classe adiutum ab eo praetorem esse, cum saepe eum litteris accersisset, tradit, nec cum gratia ab consule profectum in Asiam, indignatum quod, ut iisdem castris tenderet per-
13 missum non fuerit; ne ut equites quidem Gallos quos secum adduxerat relinqueret, impetrari ab eo potu-
14 isse. Attalum fratrem eius et remansisse apud consulem, et sinceram eius fidem aequali tenore egregiamque operam in eo bello fuisse.

XIV. Dum bellum in Macedonia geritur, legati transalpini ab regulo Gallorum—Balanos ipsius traditur nomen: gentis ex qua fuerit, non traditur—Romam venerunt pollicentes ad Macedonicum bellum
2 auxilia. Gratiae ab senatu actae muneraque missa, torquis aureus duo pondo et paterae aureae quattuor
3 pondo, equus[1] phaleratus armaque equestria. Secundum Gallos Pamphylii legati coronam auream ex viginti milibus Philippeorum factam in curiam intu-

[1] equus Fr: cui V.

---

[1] As Livy knew, trusting Valerius Antias was a hazardous proceeding. Polybius XXIX. 5 (1b) is less certain about Eumenes' attitude; Valerius perhaps reported the view prevailing in Rome at the time.

[2] They had apparently been recognized as free "friends" of Rome after a dispute as to their status under the treaty with Antiochus, XXXVIII. xxxix. 17, and xv. 6.

[3] These coins were worth about twenty silver drachmas, cf. XXXVII. lix. 4 and the note. The gift seems to have been unusually large; the Rhodians gave the same when desperately trying to regain Roman favour, see XLV. xxv. 7; the figure here may be wrong. The philip, by weight a stater or double drachma of the Athenian standard (= 8·6 g.; the theoretical U.S. gold dollar of 1934 = $15\frac{5}{21}$ grains troy = 0·988 g.),

Euboea with the rest of his ships, thinking that this B.C. 169 city was most suitable for the forwarding of supplies to the armies in Macedonia and Thessaly.

The historians give highly different accounts of King Eumenes. If you trust Valerius Antias,[1] his account is that although the praetor summoned the king with frequent despatches, he did not even receive naval assistance from him, nor did Eumenes on his way to Asia part on good terms with the consul, being indignant because he was not permitted to encamp in the Roman area; Eumenes, says Valerius, could not even be persuaded to leave behind the Galatian cavalry he had brought with him. His brother Attalus, continues Valerius, not only remained with the consul, but displayed genuine and unwavering good faith and notable exploits in this campaign.

XIV. While the war was continuing in Macedonia, envoys from across the Alps from a Gallic chieftain—his name is given as Balanos, but there is no record of his tribe—came to Rome promising aid for the Macedonian campaign. Thanks were expressed by the senate and gifts sent the envoys, a twisted necklace of two pounds of gold and golden bowls of four pounds, a horse with ornamental trappings, and cavalry weapons. After the Gauls, Pamphylian[2] envoys presented in the senate-house a gold crown made of twenty thousand philips[3] and their request was was popularized by Philip II after the fall of Olynthus in 348 B.C. He seems to have taken the coin from the Olynthians; it paralleled an earlier issue from Philippi, which began as a colony of Thasos three years before its capture by Philip, and which had an Athenian adviser. Philip continued the coinage of this town. During the second century, the philip was the commonest gold coin of Rome (see XXXIV. lii. 7; XXXVII. lix. 4; XXXIX. v. 15 and vii. 1, and frequent lerunt, petentibusque iis, ut id donum in cella Iovis optimi maximi ponere et sacrificare in Capitolio liceret, permissum; benigneque amicitiam renovare volentibus [1] legatis responsum et binum milium aeris singulis missum munus.

A.U.C. 585

Tum ab rege Prusia et paulo post ab Rhodiis de eadem re [2] longe aliter disserentes legati auditi sunt. Utraque legatio de pace reconcilianda cum rege Perseo egit. Prusiae preces magis quam postulatio fuere, profitentis et ad id tempus se cum Romanis stetisse et, quoad bellum foret, staturum; ceterum cum ad se a Perseo legati venissent de finiendo cum Romanis bello, eis [3] pollicitum deprecatorem apud senatum futurum; petere, si possent inducere in animum ut finiant iras, se [4] quoque in gratia reconciliatae pacis ponerent.[5] Haec regii legati. Rhodii superbe commemoratis meritis suis [6] erga populum Romanum et paene victoriae, utique de Antiocho rege, maiore parte ad se vindicata, adiecerunt: cum pax inter Macedonas Romanosque esset, sibi amicitiam cum rege Perseo coeptam; eam se invitos, nullo eius in se merito, quoniam ita Romanis visum sit in societatem se belli trahere, interrupisse. Tertium

[1] volentibus Fr: novantibus V.
[2] re add. Fr: om. V.
[3] eis Novák: etis V.
[4] iras se Forchhammer: ira se V.
[5] ponerent J. F. Gronovius: possent V.
[6] meritis suis add. Madvig: om. V.

---

allusions of Plautus' Bacchides, Poenulus, and Trinummus); as a result of Roman trade, philips also made their appearance in central Gaul, and were locally imitated there, in the Rhine-granted that they be permitted to deposit this B.C. 169 present in the temple of Jupiter, Greatest and Best, and to offer sacrifice on the Capitol; a gracious answer was given to the envoys' request for a renewal of the state of friendship, and a gift of two thousand asses apiece was sent them.

Next, an audience was given to envoys from King Prusias, and shortly thereafter to those from the Rhodians, who made a very different presentation of the same request. Both embassies treated of making terms again with King Perseus. Prusias' attitude was more that of entreaty than demand, for he declared that up to this time he had taken the part of the Romans, and would so continue as long as the war lasted; however, inasmuch as envoys from Perseus had come to him to discuss ending the war with the Romans, he had promised to plead Perseus' cause before the senate; he requested that if they could bring themselves to do so, they would put an end to their wrath, and would accord him, too, their thanks for the restoration of peace. So spoke the king's envoys. The Rhodians haughtily reviewed their services to the Roman people, and claimed for themselves almost the greater part of the victories, especially over King Antiochus; they then added that while peace had existed between the Macedonians and Romans, they had entered upon friendship with King Perseus; this they had broken off against their will and on account of no fault of his toward them, but because it had seemed good to the Romans to draw them into participation in the war.

land, and even in Britain. (See Seltman, Greek Coins, pp. 200–202, and R.E. 2196–2198.)

A.U.C. 585

se annum multa eius incommoda belli sentire mari intercluso; inopem insulam esse nec, nisi maritimis 11 iuvetur commeatibus, colendam. Itaque cum [1] id ultra pati non possent, legatos alios ad Persea in Macedoniam misisse qui ei denuntiarent Rhodiis placere pacem eum componere cum Romanis; se 12 Romam eadem nuntiatum missos. Per quos stetisset quo minus belli finis fieret, adversus eos quid sibi faciendum esset, Rhodios consideraturos esse.
13 Ne [2] nunc quidem haec sine indignatione legi audirive posse certum habeo; inde existimari potest, qui habitus animorum audientibus ea patribus fuerit.

XV. Claudius nihil responsum auctor est, tantum senatus consultum recitatum, quo Caras et Lycios liberos esse iuberet populus Romanus litterasque

[1] mari intercluso; inopem insulam esse, nec nisi maritimis iuvetur commeatibus colendam. Itaque cum Novák: mari intercluso; incultam insulam inopem esse, nisi maritimis iuvetur contributisque commeatibus. Cum Gitlbauer: mari interim incluso inopiam insulam inopen misso . . . ritimis iuuetur colendi itaque commeatibus cum V.

[2] ne add. Fr: om. V.

---

[1] For the services of the Rhodians, cf. XLII. xlvi. 6. According to Polybius XXVIII. 16, relations between Rome and Rhodes were entirely cordial this year; in 168 B.C. the consul Marcius suggested to an embassy of the Rhodians that they act as mediators; the only result was to encourage the pro-Macedonians in Rhodes (cf. below, xxxv. 4, where Livy still saddles the Rhodians with the onus in this matter; also XLV. iii. 3, with which cf. Polybius XXIX. 10). Polybius suspects Marcius of planning to have the Rhodians annoy the Romans and so justify Rome's overriding their independence; in view of Marcius' liking for intrigue (XLII. xlvii. 1–4), this

For the third year, they said, they were feeling many B.C. 169 inconveniences from this war because of the interruption of commerce; their island was poor, and could not be inhabited without the assistance of sea-borne supplies. Since therefore they could no longer endure this privation, they had sent other envoys to Perseus in Macedonia, to inform him that it was the Rhodians' wish that he should arrange a peace with the Romans, and that they had sent a similar announcement to Rome. If either party was responsible for preventing the ending of the war, the Rhodians would deliberate as to what action they ought to take against this party.

I feel sure that even now these statements cannot be read or heard without indignation; from this one can judge what the senate's state of mind was as they listened.[1]

XV. Claudius has it that the senate returned no answer, but only had read its decree that the Roman people gave the Carians and Lycians their freedom [2] and that despatches should be immediately sent to both peoples, on hearing which the chief of the is quite probable. In XLV. xxii. 2, Livy suggests that Roman suspicion of Rhodes was something new in 167 B.C.; in XLV. xxv. 6, the "freeing" of Lycia and Caria seems to have been ordered in that year. Claudius (see below) or some other annalist seems to have misled Livy by anticipating developments. Cassius Dio XX. fr. 66, 2 = Zonaras 9. 22 says that Perseus would have been granted peace but for the tactlessness of the Rhodians. Livy certainly had no suspicion that the Romans might have continued to tolerate Perseus.

[2] Previous friction between these peoples and the Rhodians was noted in XLI. vi. 8–12, cf. the note, and XLII. xiv. 8. Polybius XXX. 5. 12 records a decree "freeing" the Carians and Lycians in the year 168–7 B.C., probably the time when it was actually passed.

c. 2 extemplo ad utramque gentem mitti;[1] qua audita
5 re principem legationis, cuius magniloquentiam vix curia paulo ante ceperat, corruisse.
3 Alii responsum esse tradunt, populum Romanum et principio eius belli haud vanis auctoribus compertum habuisse Rhodios cum Perseo rege adversus rem publicam suam occulta consilia inisse, et si id[2] ante 4 dubium fuisset, legatorum paulo[3] ante verba ad certum redegisse, et plerumque ipsam se fraudem, 5 etiamsi initio cautior fuerit, detegere. Rhodios nunc[4] in orbe terrarum arbitria belli pacisque agere:
Rhodiorum[5] nutu arma sumpturos positurosque
Romanos esse. Iam non deos foederum testis, sed
6 Rhodios habituros. Itane tandem? ni[6] pareatur iis exercitusque de Macedonia deportentur, visuros esse 7 quid sibi faciendum sit? quid Rhodii visuri sint, ipsos scire. Populum certe Romanum devicto Perseo, quod prope diem sperent fore, visurum ut pro meritis cuiusque in eo bello civitatis gratiam dignam referat.
8 Munus tamen legatis in singulos binum milium aeris missum est, quod ii non acceperunt.

XVI. Litterae deinde recitatae Q. Marcii consulis sunt, quemadmodum saltu superato in Macedoniam
2 transisset: ibi et ex aliis locis commeatus se[7] pros-

[1] gentem mitti Hartel: gentem ut sciret iudicatum mitti Madvig: gentem ut id sciret indicatum mitti Weissenborn: gentem sciret indicatum mitti V.

[2] inisse et si id Fr: inissetid V.

[3] legatorum paulo Fr: legatorum occulta consilia inisset paulo V.

[4] nunc I. Perizonius: nuntio V.

[5] Rhodiorum Crévier: deorum V.

[6] ni Kreyssig: is V.

[7] se Vahlen: remp. V.

Rhodian embassy, for whose proud language the B.C. 169 senate-house had but a moment before seemed too small, now suffered deflation. Other historians record the following answer:

"At the outset of this war the Roman people were informed by no trifling sources that the Rhodians had entered upon secret plots with King Perseus against the Roman state,[1] but even had this been doubtful before, the words of the embassy just uttered have made the matter certain. Frequently treachery unmasks itself, even if it is more wary at first. And now the Rhodians pass judgment throughout the world as to peace and war! At the beck and call of the Rhodians will the Romans take up and lay down their arms! Now we are no longer to call upon the gods to witness treaties, but rather the Rhodians! Unless obedience is rendered them, and our armies are removed from Macedonia, the Rhodians will see, will they, what they must do? What the Rhodians will see, they themselves know. But surely the Roman people, after their conquest of Perseus, which they hope will take place any day, will see that they repay a suitable reward for the actions of each state during the war." Nevertheless, a present of two thousand sesterces apiece was sent to the envoys, which they refused.

XVI. Thereafter despatches from Quintus Marcius the consul were read, describing his crossing over into Macedonia, by forcing the pass; in Macedonia he had procured supplies in advance of winter from [1] Cf. XLII. xxvi. 8 for earlier Roman suspicions, which to a large extent resulted from the Rhodians' non-partisanship, based on a preference for a balance of power, cf. XLII. xxx. 5–6.

u.c. 585

pectos in hiemem habere et ab Epirotis viginti milia modium tritici, decem hordei sumpsisse, ut pro eo frumento pecunia Romae legatis eorum curaretur. 3 Vestimenta militibus ab Roma mittenda esse; equis ducentis ferme opus esse, maxime Numidicis, nec 4 sibi [1] in his locis ullam copiam esse. Senatus consultum, ut ea omnia ex litteris consulis fierent, factum est. C. Sulpicius praetor sex milia togarum, triginta tunicarum, equos ducentos [2] deportanda in Macedoniam praebendaque arbitratu consulis locavit et legatis Epirotarum pecuniam pro frumento solvit et Onesimum, Pythonis filium, nobilem Macedonem, 5 in senatum introduxit. Is pacis semper auctor regi fuerat monueratque, sicut pater eius Philippus institutum usque ad ultimum vitae diem servarat [3] cotidie, bis in die foederis icti cum Romanis perlegendi, ut eum morem, si non semper, crebro tamen usurparet. 6 Postquam deterrere eum a bello nequiit, primo subtrahere sese per alias atque alias causas,[4] ne interesset iis quae non probabat, coepit; postremo, cum suspectum se esse cerneret et proditionis interdum crimine insimulari, ad Romanos transfugit et [5] magno 7 usui consuli fuit. Ea introductus in curiam cum memorasset, senatus in formulam sociorum eum

[1] Numidicis nec sibi Novák: numidineesi V.
[2] ducentos Forchhammer: et V.
[3] servarat Drakenborch: servabat V.
[4] causas add. Fr: om. V.
[5] et add. Drakenborch: om. V.

[1] He was the city praetor, cf. XLIII. xv. 3. Under Sulpicius' sponsorship as praetor, Ennius produced his Thyestes (Cicero, Brutus 78), and in his consulship, Terence produced his Andria; for Sulpicius' prediction of an eclipse, see below, xxxvii. 5.

various localities, and in particular had received B.C. 169 twenty thousand bushels of wheat and ten thousand of barley from the Epirotes, so that payment for this grain should be arranged with their envoys at Rome. Clothes, said the consul, should be sent to the army from Rome; there was need for about two hundred horses, especially Numidians, and he had no supply of them where he was. A decree of the senate was passed to carry out these requests of the consul. Gaius Sulpicius the praetor [1] let a contract for transporting to Macedonia six thousand togas,[2] thirty thousand tunics, and two hundred horses, and for depositing them where the consul chose. Sulpicius also paid the envoys of the Epirotes the price of the grain, and brought before the senate Onesimus, son of Pytho, a Macedonian noble. He had always been a proponent of peace to the king, and had advised him to adopt frequently, if not regularly, the practice which his father Philip had begun and continued to the last day of his life—namely, that of reading through twice daily the treaty he had made with the Romans. After Onesimus had been unable to discourage the king from war, Onesimus began at first to withdraw on one excuse or another, so as not to be associated with projects of which he disapproved. Finally, when he saw that he was an object of suspicion and that occasionally he was being charged by innuendo with treachery, he deserted to the Romans and made himself very useful to the consul. On being introduced to the senate, he recited these facts, and the senate ordered that he be enrolled in the category of allies, that a residence and entertainment

[2] For this use of a civilian garment by soldiers, cf. XXII. liv. 2 and the note.

U.C. 585 referri iussit, locum, lautia praeberi, agri Tarentini [1] qui publicus populi Romani esset ducenta iugera dari, et aedes Tarenti emi. Uti ea curaret, C. Decimio praetori mandatum.

8 Censores censum [2] idibus Decembribus severius quam ante habuerunt: multis equi adempti, inter quos P. Rutilio, qui tribunus plebis eos violenter accusarat; tribu quoque is motus et aerarius [3]
9 factus. Ad opera publica facienda cum eis dimidium ex vectigalibus eius anni attributum ex senatus con-
10 sulto a quaestoribus esset, Ti. Sempronius ex ea pecunia, quae ipsi attributa erat, aedes P. Africani pone Veteres ad Vortumni signum lanienasque [4] et 11 tabernas coniunctas in publicum emit basilicamque faciendam curavit, quae postea Sempronia appellata est.

XVII. Iam in exitu annus erat et propter Macedonici maxime belli curam in sermonibus homines habebant quos in annum consules ad finiendum tan-
2 dem id bellum crearent. Itaque senatus consultum factum est, ut Cn. Servilius primo quoque tempore ad

[1] Tarentini Fr: intrarentin V.
[2] mandatum. Censores censum Fr: mandatū recensum V.
[3] aerarius Ursinus: operarius V.
[4] lanienas Turnebus: laneas V.

---

[1] For similar rewards, cf. II. xvi. 4–5; XXIII. xlvi. 6–7; XXVI. xxi. 9–13.

[2] He was praetor in charge of aliens, XLIII. xv. 3.

[3] Severity to knights was previously mentioned, XLIII. xvi. 1; either the process was interrupted by the objections there described, or the censors conducted a new review at this later date. Rutilius was now open to their attack, because he had left the tribunate four days before on December 9.

[4] Africanus was the father-in-law of the censor. The Old Shops had been built in 209 B.C., cf. XXVII. xi. 16, and were be provided for him, that two hundred acres of the B.C. 169 public land of the Roman people in the district of Tarentum be given him, and that a house be bought for him at Tarentum.[1] Gaius Decimius the praetor[2] was entrusted with the execution of these orders.

The censors conducted the census on the thirteenth of December more strictly than before. Many were deprived of their rank of knights, among them Publius Rutilius who as tribune of the commons had violently assailed the censors; he was also removed from his tribe and disenfranchised.[3] As half the revenues of the year had by decree of the senate been assigned by the quaestors to the censors for the construction of public works, Titus Sempronius, out of the funds assigned to him, bought for the state the house of Publius Africanus behind the Old Shops in the direction of the statue of Vortumnus, as well as the butcher's stalls and the shops adjacent, and saw to the construction of the basilica which afterward received the name of Sempronian.[4]

XVII. The year was drawing to its close, and because of concern, especially for the war with Macedonia, men were discussing what consuls they should elect for this year, to bring this war at last to an end. A resolution of the senate was therefore passed, that Gnaeus Servilius should come as promptly so called to distinguish them from some built in 194 B.C. The bronze statue of the Etruscan god Vortumnus stood in the Vicus Tuscus some distance south-west of the Forum, but visible from it; the statue is mentioned by Cicero, in Verrem II. I. 59, 154, and Propertius V. (IV.) 2. The god, whose name seems to be good Latin, was in charge of turning or exchange, and received a temple in Rome after the overthrow of his home town of Volsinii in 264 B.C. The Basilica Sempronia was later supplanted by the Basilica Julia.

r.c. 85 3 comitia habenda veniret. Senatus consultum Sulpicius praetor ad consulem misit, litterasque allatas a consule post paucos dies recitavit, quibus in ante diem . . . comitia edixit: se ante eum diem [1] in urbem venturum. Et consul maturavit et comitia eo
4 die qui dictus erat sunt perfecta. Consules creati L. Aemilius Paulus iterum, quarto [2] decumo anno postquam primo consul fuerat, et C. Licinius Crassus.
5 Praetores postero die facti Cn. Baebius Tamphilus,[3] L. Anicius Gallus, Cn. Octavius, P. Fonteius Balbus,
6 M. Aebutius Helva, C. Papirius Carbo. Omnia ut maturius agerentur, belli Macedonici stimulabat
7 cura. Itaque designatos extemplo sortiri placuit provincias, ut, cum [4] utri Macedonia consuli cuique praetori classis evenisset sciretur, ii iam inde [5] cogitarent pararentque quae bello usui forent, senatumque consulerent, si qua de [6] re consulto opus
8 esset. Latinas, ubi magistratum inissent, quod per religiones posset primo quoque tempore fieri placere, ne quid [7] consulem, cui eundum in Macedoniam esset,
9 teneret. His decretis, consulibus Italia et Macedonia, praetoribus praeter duas iurisdictiones in urbe classis et Hispania et Sicilia et Sardinia provinciae

[1] misit, litterasque allatas a consule . . . in . . . comitia edixit; se ante eum diem add. Vahlen: om. V.
[2] quarto Sigonius: septumo V.
[3] Baebius Fr: Tamphilus Sigonius: pa pilius V.
[4] placuit provincias ut cum Madvig: placuit provideanteum V.
[5] ii iam inde Madvig: utiaminide V.

as possible to hold the elections. The praetor B.C. 169
Sulpicius forwarded the resolution to the consul, and read to the senate a few days later the return despatch from that officer. In this, he set the day for the elections as . . . , and announced his return to the city previous to that time. The consul made haste, and the elections were completed on the day set. There were elected as consuls Lucius Aemilius Paulus for the second time, in the fourteenth year after his first term, and Gaius Licinius Crassus. On the following day, there were elected to the praetorship Gnaeus Baebius Tamphilus, Lucius Anicius Gallus, Gnaeus Octavius, Publius Fonteius Balbus, Marcus Aebutius Helva, and Gaius Papirius Carbo. Concern for the war with Macedonia induced the speeding up of the whole procedure. Therefore it was voted that these magistrates-elect should be allotted their fields of operation immediately, so that when it was known which consul had received Macedonia and which praetor the fleet, the designated men might begin their plans and preparations of the supplies necessary for war and might consult the senate if there was need for consultation on any subject. It was determined to hold the Latin Festival as soon as was possible on religious grounds after the entrance upon office of the magistrates, to avoid any delay to the consul who was to set out for Macedonia. In these decrees, the fields of operation for the consuls were designated as Macedonia and Italy; those for the praetors were, besides the two jurisdictions in the city, the fleet, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. Mace-

[6] de add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[7] ne quid Forchhammer: neque V.

u.c. 585 10 nominatae sunt. Consulum Aemilio Macedonia, Licinio Italia evenit. Praetores Cn. Baebius urbanam, L. Anicius peregrinam et si quo senatus censuisset, Cn. Octavius classem, P. Fonteius Hispaniam, M. Aebutius Siciliam,[1] C. Papirius Sardiniam est sortitus.

XVIII. Extemplo apparuit omnibus non segniter id bellum L. Aemilium gesturum, praeterquam quod militaris [2] vir erat, etiam quod dies noctesque intentus ea sola quae ad id bellum pertinerent animo agitabat. 2 Iam omnium primum a senatu petit, ut legatos in Macedoniam mitterent ad exercitus visendos classemque et comperta referenda, quid aut terrestribus 3 aut navalibus copiis opus esset[3]; praeterea ut explorarent copias regias quantum possent, qua[4] provincia nostra, qua hostium foret: utrum intra saltus castra Romani haberent, an iam omnes angustiae exsuperatae, et in aequa loca pervenis- 4 sent; qui fideles nobis socii, qui dubii suspensaeque ex fortuna fidei, qui certi hostes viderentur; quanti praeparati commeatus, et unde terrestri itinere, unde navibus subportarentur; quid ea aestate terra marique rerum gestum [5] esset: ex his bene cognitis certa

[1] M. Aebutius Siciliam add. Fr: om. V.
[2] militaris H. A. Koch: alias Hertz: talis Forchhammer: aliis V.
[3] esset Sigonius: est V.
[4] qua Vahlen: quaqua V.
[5] gestum J. F. Gronovius: gestarum V.

---

[1] It was later assumed, cf. C.I.L. I.² 1, p. 194, elogium XV. and Plutarch, Aemilius x that Paulus was electel as general for Macedonia; this cannot be taken literally, as it would have been the senate which assigned him to a province;

donia fell to the lot of the consul Aemilius,[1] Italy to B.C 169
Licinius. Of the praetors, Gnaeus Baebius received the jurisdiction over citizens, Lucius Anicius was given that over aliens and was placed at the disposal of the senate, Gnaeus Octavius received the fleet, Publius Fonteius Spain, Marcus Aebutius Sicily, and Gnaeus Papirius Sardinia.

XVIII. It was at once obvious to everyone that Lucius Aemilius was going to prosecute this war in no sluggish fashion, not only because he was a warlike man, but also because without relaxing by day or night he turned over in his mind nothing but what concerned this war. First of all he requested the senate to send envoys to Macedonia to inspect the armies and the fleet and to report their findings as to what was needed by way of forces on land or sea; moreover, they were to collect information as far as possible about the king's forces and about the terrain under our control and under that of the enemy. They were to investigate the following: whether the Romans were encamped among the mountains or whether all the narrows had been passed and the plains reached; which of the allies were loyal to us, which were wavering and of a loyalty dependent on fortune, and which seemed definitely hostile; how large a supply of provisions had been prepared and whence they could be brought, by a land route or by ships, respectively; what had been achieved on land and sea during this summer. From good information on these points sure decisions might be made for the unless a judicious falsifying of the allotment process took place, the appointment of Paulus was a bit of the felicitas of the Roman people. Crassus had a respectable record as a soldier, cf. XLII. lviii. 12.

B.C. 585

5 in futurum consilia capi posse. Senatus[1] Cn. Servilio consuli negotium dedit ut tris[2] in Macedoniam quos L. Aemilio videretur, legaret. Legati biduo post profecti Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, A. Licinius Nerva, L. Baebius.

6 Bis in exitu anni eius lapidatum esse nuntiatum est, semel[3] in Romano agro, semel in Veienti. Bis[4] 7 novemdiale sacrum factum est. Sacerdotes eo anno mortui sunt P. Quinctilius Varus flamen Martialis et M. Claudius Marcellus decemvir; in cuius locum Cn. 8 Octavius suffectus. Et iam magnificentia crescente notatum est ludis circensibus P. Corneli Scipionis Nasicae et P. Lentuli aedilium curulium[5] sexaginta tres Africanas et quadraginta ursos et elephantos lusisse.

B.C. 586

XIX. L. Aemilio Paulo C. Licinio consulibus, idibus Martiis, principio insequentis anni, cum in expectatione patres fuissent, maxime quidnam consul de Macedonia, cuius ea provincia esset, referret, nihil se habere Paulus quod referret, cum nondum legati[6] 2 redissent, dixit. Ceterum Brundisi legatos iam esse, 3 bis ex cursu Dyrrachium reiectos.[7] Cognitis mox quae nosci prius in rem esset, relaturum; id fore intra 4 perpaucos dies. Et ne quid profectionem suam

[1] posse. Senatus Bekker: posseseratus V.
[2] dedit ut tris Harant: dedit utris V.
[3] est. semel Madvig: esse V.
[4] semel in Veienti. Bis Madvig: simul in beientibus V.
[5] aedilium curulium ed. Bas. 1535: aedilis curulis V.
[6] cum nondum legati Fr: cum nondum III legati Rossbach: nondum inlegati V.

future, said Aemilius. The senate gave the consul B.C. 169
Gnaeus Servilius the task of choosing three men satisfactory to Lucius Aemilius as envoys to Macedonia. Two days later the envoys set out—Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, Aulus Licinius Nerva, and Lucius Baebius.

Report was made of two showers of stones near the end of this year, one on Roman land, one on that of Veii. On both occasions a nine-day rite was performed. The priests who died during this year were Publius Quinctilius Varus, the flamen of Mars,[1] and Marcus Claudius Marcellus of the Board of Ten. Gnaeus Octavius replaced the latter. Display being now on the increase, it is recorded that at the games in the arena by the curule aediles Publius Cornelius Scipio Nasica and Publius Lentulus, sixty-three leopards and forty bears and elephants participated.

XIX. In the consulship of Lucius Aemilius Paulus B.C. 168 and Gaius Licinius, on the fifteenth of March, at the beginning of the new year, the senators were on the qui vive, especially as to what the consul in charge of Macedonia would bring before them about his field of operations. But Paulus said that he had nothing to present until the envoys returned, but that the envoys were now at Brundisium, after having been blown back twice to Dyrrachium on their voyage. As soon as he acquired the information which was the first necessity, he would lay matters before the senate, and this would take place within a very few days. In order to avoid any delay to his setting-

[1] He was replaced in the following year by Lucius Postumius Albinus, XLV. xv. 10.

[7] reiectos Manutius: eiectos V.

c.c. 86 teneret, pridie idus Apriles Latinis esse constitutam diem. Sacrificio rite perfecto et se et [1] Cn. Octavium, simul senatus censuisset, exituros esse. C. Licinio collegae suo fore curae se absente, ut si qua parari mittique [2] ad id bellum opus sit, parentur mittanturque. Interea legationes exterarum nationum audiri posse.

6 Primi [3] Alexandrini legati ab Ptolemaeo et Cleo-
7 patra [4] regibus vocati sunt. Sordidati, barba et capillo promisso, cum ramis oleae ingressi curiam procubuerunt, et oratio quam habitus fuit miserabilior.
8 Antiochus Syriae rex, qui obses Romae fuerat, per honestam speciem maioris Ptolemaei reducendi in regnum, bellum cum minore fratre eius, qui tum
9 Alexandriam tenebat, gerens et ad Pelusium navali proelio superior [5] fuerat et tumultuario opere ponte per Nilum facto transgressus cum exercitu obsidione ipsam Alexandriam terrebat, nec procul abesse quin
10 potiretur regno opulentissimo videbatur. Ea legati querentes orabant senatum ut opem regno regibusque
11 amicis imperio Romano [6] ferrent. Ea merita populi Romani in Antiochum, eam apud omnes reges gentesque auctoritatem esse ut, si legatos misissent

[1] et se et Harant: esset V.
[2] mittique H. J. Müller: mittiue V.
[3] posse. Primi Crévier: possesacrificioriteperfectoprimi V, cf. § 4 supra.
[4] Ptolemaeo et Cleopatra Fr: ptolemeopatra V.
[5] superior add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[6] Romano add. Zingerle: om. V.

[1] The date is given below, xxii. 16, as March 31; in either case, it was very early as compared with dates cited elsewhere, e.g., XLI. xvi. 1 (May 5), XLII. xxxv. 3 (June 1). Actually, due to the confusion of the calendar, the festival was held in late January this year, cf. below, xxxvii. 8.

out, said Paulus, the day for the Latin Festival had B.C. 168 been set at April twelfth[1]; after the proper performance of the sacrifice, if the senate concurred, he and Gnaeus Octavius would both set out. His colleague Gaius Licinius would take care, in his absence, to get ready and send out what should be made ready and sent to the war; meanwhile, said Paulus, the embassies of foreign nations might be given audience.

First the envoys from King Ptolemy and Queen Cleopatra at Alexandria were announced. Grimy,[2] with untrimmed beard and hair, they entered the senate-house bearing olive-branches, and prostrated themselves; their speech was more pitiable than their array. Antiochus, the king of Syria, who had been a hostage at Rome, under the decent pretext of restoring the elder Ptolemy to his throne, was waging war against the younger brother, who was then in possession of Alexandria.[3] Antiochus had won a naval battle at Pelusium and, after leading his forces across the Nile on a hastily-constructed bridge, was overawing Alexandria with his siege and seemed to be on the very point of laying his hands on a very rich kingdom. Complaining of this attack, the envoys begged the senate to come to the rescue of a kingdom and a royal pair who were friends of Roman rule. Such, they argued, were the benefits conferred on Antiochus by the Roman people, and such their influence with all kings and nations that, if they sent [2] As part of their costume as suppliants.

[3] On Antiochus' sojourn at Rome, cf. XLI. xx; a previous stage in Antiochus' encroachment on Egypt was mentioned in XLII. xxix. 5, cf. Polybius XXVII. 19, also XXVIII. 18 f. (16 f.) The "elder Ptolemy" is Ptolemy VI Philometor; the "younger," Euergetes II.

u.c. 586 qui ei nuntiarent [1] non placere senatui sociis regibus bellum fieri, extemplo abscessurus a moenibus Alexandreae abducturusque exercitum in Syriam esset.
12 Quod si cunctentur facere, brevi extorres regno Ptolemaeum et Cleopatram Romam venturos, cum pudore quodam populi Romani, quod nullam opem in 13 ultimo discrimine fortunarum tulissent. Moti patres precibus Alexandrinorum extemplo C. Popilium Laenatem et C. Decimium et C. Hostilium legatos ad
14 finiendum inter reges bellum miserunt. Prius Antiochum, dein Ptolemaeum adire iussi et nuntiare, ni absistatur bello, per utrum stetisset, eum non pro amico nec pro socio habituros esse.

XX. His intra triduum simul cum legatis Alexandrinis profectis legati ex Macedonia quinquatribus ultimis adeo expectati venerunt ut, nisi [2] vesper esset,
2 extemplo senatum vocaturi consules fuerint. Postero die senatus fuit legatique auditi sunt. Ii nuntiant maiore periculo quam emolumento exercitum per
3 invios saltus in Macedoniam inductum. Pieriam, quo processisset, regem tenere; castra castris prope ita conlata esse, ut flumine Elpeo [3] interiecto arceantur. Neque regem pugnandi potestatem facere, nec

[1] ei nuntiarent Harant: enuntiarent V.
[2] ut nisi Kreyssig: utuinisi V.
[3] Elpeo Madvig: epeia V.

[1] Polybius XXIX. 2 (1) stresses the Roman interest in keeping Antiochus out of Egypt; he does not indicate that the Roman embassy accompanied the Egyptians, and puts more emphasis than does Livy on Roman initiative.

[2] This festival, first mentioned for the year 207 B.C., occurred on March 19–23, see XXVI. xxvii. 1 and the note, also Ovid, Fasti III. 810; C.I.L. I.² 1, p. 312 gives a discussion of the origin of the name (probably because it originally fell on the "fifth" day, Roman inclusive reckoning, after the Ides), envoys to declare to Antiochus that the senate did not B.C. 168 wish war to be made on kings allied to it, Antiochus would at once depart from the walls of Alexandria and would lead his army back into Syria. If they hesitated to do this, shortly Ptolemy and Cleopatra, robbed of their kingdom, would arrive in Rome, somewhat to the shame of the Roman people, because they had offered no aid in the final crisis of their fortunes. The senators, stirred by the entreaties of the Alexandrines, at once [1] sent Gaius Popilius Laenas, Gaius Decimius, and Gaius Hostilius as envoys to bring an end to the war between the kings. They were instructed to approach first Antiochus and then Ptolemy, and to proclaim that if war was not concluded, the party constituting the obstacle would not be considered either a friend or an ally to the Romans.

XX. This embassy left within three days along with the envoys from Alexandria. The mission from Macedonia arrived on the last day of the Quinquatrus [2] amid such eagerness that, had it not been evening, the consuls would have summoned the senate at once. Next day the session was held and the envoys were heard. They reported as follows: "The army has been led into Macedonia by trackless passes at a risk disproportionate to the gain. Pieria, which the army has reached, is in the hands of the king; the encampments are so nearly in contact that hardly more than the Elpeüs River separates them. The king does not offer battle, and our forces have and points out that besides being connected with Minerva, the day had associations with Mars, and seems to have been the time for ceremonial readying of weapons for the campaigning season.

4 nostris vim ad cogendum esse. Hiemem etiam insuper[1] rebus gerendis intervenisse. In otio militem ali,[2] nec plus quam VI dierum[3] frumentum habere. 5 Macedonum dici triginta milia armatorum esse. Si Ap. Claudio circa Lychnidum satis validus exercitus foret, potuisse eum[4] ancipiti bello distinere regem: nunc et Appium et quod[5] cum eo praesidii sit in summo periculo esse, nisi propere aut iustus exercitus 6 eo mittatur, aut illi inde deducantur. Ad classem se ex castris profectos sociorum navalium partem morbo audisse absumptam, partem, maxime qui ex Sicilia fuerint, domos suas abisse, et homines navibus deesse: qui sint, neque stipendium accepisse neque vesti- 7 menta habere. Eumenen classemque eius, tamquam vento adlatas naves, sine causa et venisse et abisse; nec animum eius regis constare satis visum. Sicut omnia de Eumene dubia, ita[6] Attali egregie constantem fidem nuntiabant.

XXI. Legatis auditis tunc de bello referre sese L. 2 Aemilius dixit. Senatus decrevit, ut in octo[7] legiones parem numerum tribunorum consules et populus

[1] Hiemem etiam insuper Vahlen: in hiemem etiam in spe V.
[2] In otio militem ali Fr: notiomilitialii V.
[3] dierum add. Sigonius: mensium add. Kreyssig: modium add. Goldbacher: om. V.
[4] potuisse eum Harant: potuisset in V.
[5] quod add. Fr: om. V.
[6] ita add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[7] ut in octo ed. Bas. 1535: utiocto V.

---

[1] Livy has not mentioned him since XLIII. xxiii. 6; Polybius XXVIII. 13 (11) tells how Appius in the meantime had tried to raise Achaean troops, but had been hindered by Marcius.

not the strength to compel him to do so. Also the winter is an added obstacle to an active campaign. The soldiers are being supported in idleness and have grain for no more than six days. The Macedonian forces are said to number thirty thousand. If Appius Claudius [1] had sufficient strength in the region of Lychnidus, he could have distracted the king with a second front; as it is, Appius and the force with him are in the greatest danger unless either a full-fledged army is quickly sent him or his present force is extricated. As to the fleet, we heard after we left the camp that some of the sailors have been lost by disease, and some, especially the Sicilians, have gone home, so that the ships lack crews. Those who are there have not received their pay and are insufficiently clothed. Eumenes and his fleet have come and gone for no good reason, as if his ships were drifting before the wind; and there is no good evidence that the spirit of this king is unwavering." [2] The envoys reported that Attalus was as gallantly unswerving as Eumenes was entirely undependable. B.C. 168

XXI. After hearing the envoys, Lucius Aemilius laid before the senate the question of the conduct of the war. The senate decreed that the consuls and the people should each choose half of the tribunes for [2] The immediate facts reported by Livy, above, x. 12–xiii. 10, and xxviii, do not bear this out; but Eumenes was not above bargaining with Perseus, below, xxiv–xxv (based on Polybius), and some of Livy's sources may have projected back later Roman suspicions, cf. above, xiii. 9. 12–13. Livy usually falls into the attitude, natural enough for his own day, that no one had any business to act contrary to Roman interests; but in the second century, Rome was not the paramount power in the Macedonian–Greek world, and it was not even clear that she proposed at this time to take a permanent interest in the affairs of that region.

.c. crearent; creari autem neminem eo anno placere,
6 3 nisi qui honorem gessisset. Tum ex omnibus tribunis militum uti L. Aemilius in duas legiones in Macedoniam, quos eorum velit, eligat et ut sollemni Latinarum perfecto L. Aemilius consul, Cn. Octavius praetor, cui classis obtigisset, in provinciam pro-
4 ficiscantur. Additus est his tertius L. Anicius praetor, cuius inter peregrinos iurisdictio erat; eum in provinciam Illyricum circa Lychnidum Ap. Claudio
5 succedere placuit. Dilectus cura C. Licinio consuli imposita. Is septem [1] milia civium Romanorum et 6 equites ducentos scribere iussus et sociis nominis Latini septem milia peditum imperare, quadringentos
7 equites, et Cn. Servilio Galliam obtinenti provinciam litteras mittere ut sescentos equites conscriberet.
8 Hunc exercitum ad collegam primo quoque tempore mittere in Macedoniam iussus; neque in ea provincia plus quam duas legiones esse; eas repleri, ut sena milia peditum, trecenos haberent equites; ceteros
9 pedites equitesque [2] in praesidiis disponi. Qui eorum idonei ad militandum non essent, dimitti. Decem praeterea milia peditum imperata sociis et octingenti
10 equites. Id praesidii additum Anicio praeter duas

[1] imposita. Is septem Fr: inpositiscentum V.
[2] pedites equitesque Vahlen: peditesque V.

---

[1] These provisions for officering the legions provided for reasonably competent officers, while still avoiding the suspicion of favouritism among an office-holding clique which may have caused the use of popular election of tribunes the previous year, XLIII. xii. 7. Of the eight legions, two were probably for Gaul (i.e., north Italy), and two were to be Home Guard (urbanae); officers less competent or less congenial to the consuls could be shunted to these legions. The dangers of eight legions; however, it was voted that no one who B.C. 168 had not held office should be chosen that year.[1] Then from among the tribunes Lucius Aemilius was to choose whomever he preferred for the two legions for Macedonia. It was further voted that after the completion of the Latin Festival, the consul Lucius Aemilius and Gnaeus Octavius, the praetor to whom the fleet had been allotted, should depart for their field of operations. To them was added the praetor Lucius Anicius, whose post was the court for aliens; it was voted that he should succeed Appius Claudius in the Illyrian theatre near Lychnidus. Charge over the levy was given to the consul Gaius Licinius. He was instructed to enroll seven thousand Roman citizens and two hundred horsemen and to demand of the allies of the Latin Name seven thousand infantry and four hundred cavalry, and he was to send a despatch to Gnaeus Servilius the commander in the province of Gaul, instructing him to enroll six hundred cavalry. This force Licinius was ordered to send as promptly as possible to his colleague in Macedonia; a limit of two legions was placed on the army on that front, and each legion was to be reinforced till it contained six thousand infantry and three hundred cavalry; the surplus infantry and cavalry were to be distributed as garrisons. Men unfit for military service were to be discharged. An added levy was imposed on the allies of ten thousand infantry and eight hundred cavalry. This force was given to Anicius besides the [1] "inbreeding" in office-holding at Rome are especially well illustrated by the Jugurthine War; the counter-dangers of politically able commoners elevated to military posts are shown by the careers of Flaminius and Varro in the Second Punic War.

B.C. 586 legiones, quas portare in Macedoniam est iussus, quina milia peditum et ducenos habentes, trecenos equites. Et in classem quinque milia navalium socium 11 sunt scripta. Licinius consul duabus legionibus obtinere provinciam iussus; eo addere sociorum decem milia peditum et sescentos equites.

XXII. Senatus consultis perfectis L. Aemilius consul e curia in contionem processit orationemque
2 talem habuit[1]: "animadvertisse videor, Quirites, maiorem mihi sortito Macedoniam provinciam gratulationem factam, quam cum aut consul sum creatus,[2]
3 aut quo die magistratum inii,[3] neque id ob aliam causam, quam quia bello in Macedonia, quod diu trahitur, existimastis dignum maiestate populi Romani exitum per me imponi posse. Deos quoque huic favisse sorti spero eosdemque in rebus gerendis
4 adfuturos esse. Haec partim ominari,[4] partim sperare possum; illud adfirmare pro certo audeo,[5] me omni ope adnisurum esse, ne[6] frustra vos hanc
5 spem de me conceperitis. Quae ad bellum opus sunt et senatus decrevit et, quoniam extemplo proficisci placet neque ego in mora sum, C. Licinius collega, vir egregius, aeque enixe parabit ac si ipse id bellum
6 gesturus esset. Vos quae scripsero senatui ac vobis, iis modo credite et cavete rumores credulitate vestra
7 alatis,[7] quorum auctor nemo extabit. Nam nunc

[1] habuit add. Fr: om. V.
[2] aut consul sum creatus Playgers: aut conpulsus consulatus V.
[3] inii Madvig: inissent V.
[4] ominari Crévier: opinari V.
[5] certo audeo Madvig: certo habeo audeo V.
[6] ne add. Fr: om. V.
[7] ac vobis, iis modo credite et cavete rumores credulitate vestra alatis Novák: aut vobis mores crudelitatis vestrae adlatis V.

two legions which he was ordered to transport to Macedonia, each legion having five thousand two hundred infantry and three hundred cavalry. Moreover, five thousand sailors were enrolled for the fleet. Licinius the consul was ordered to hold his area with two legions, and to add to them ten thousand infantry and six hundred cavalry of the allies. B.C. 168

XXII. When the senate had finished its voting, the consul Lucius Aemilius went from the senate-house to a public meeting and made the following speech: "I seem to have noticed, fellow-citizens, that greater congratulations were offered me when I was allotted Macedonia as my field of operations than when my election as consul was announced, or on the day when I entered upon office. The reason for this was none other, I believe, than that you regard me as capable of bringing the long-drawn-out war in Macedonia to an end worthy of the high position of the Roman people. The gods too, I hope, approve this fall of the lot and will likewise be at my side in action. So far I can partly prophesy, and partly hope; another matter I dare to assert as sure—namely, that I will strive with every effort that the hope you have conceived for me shall not be vain. What is required for the war has been voted by the senate, and since it is determined that I shall set out at once, for which I am not reluctant, the preparations will be made by that excellent man, my colleague Gaius Licinius, as vigorously as if he were going to conduct the campaign. For your part, see to it that you have confidence only in the reports I make to the senate and to you, and beware of nourishing by your credulity the gossip for which no sponsor will appear. For I have noticed that, as is commonly the case, so

r.c. 36 quidem, quod vulgo fieri, hoc praecipue bello, animadverti, nemo tam famae contemptor est cuius
8 non debilitari animus possit. In omnibus circulis atque etiam, si dis placet, in conviviis sunt qui exercitus in Macedoniam ducant, ubi castra locanda sint sciant, quae loca praesidiis occupanda, quando aut quo saltu intranda Macedonia, ubi horrea ponenda, qua terra, mari subvehantur commeatus, quando cum hoste manus conserendae, quando quiesse
9 sit melius. Nec quid faciendum [1] sit modo statuunt, sed quidquid aliter quam ipsi censuere factum est,
10 consulem veluti dicta die accusant. Haec magna impedimenta res gerentibus sunt.[2] Neque enim omnes tam firmi et constantis animi contra adversum rumorem esse possunt, quam [3] Q. Fabius fuit qui suum imperium minui per vanitatem populi maluit
11 quam secunda fama male rem publicam gerere. Non sum is, Quirites,[4] qui non existimem admonendos duces esse: immo eum qui de sua unius sententia omnia gerat, superbum iudico magis quam sapientem.
12 Quid ergo est? primum a prudentibus et proprie rei militaris peritis et usu doctis monendi imperatores sunt: deinde ab iis [5] qui intersunt gerendis rebus, qui loca,[6] qui hostem, qui temporum opportunitatem vident, qui in eodem velut navigio participes sunt 13 periculi. Itaque si quis est qui, quod e re publica sit, suadere se mihi in eo bello quod gesturus sum confidat, is ne deneget operam rei publicae et in

[1] quiesse sit melius. Nec quid faciendum Kreyssig: quiesset sit ne quid melius faciendum V.
[2] sunt Fr: quae V.
[3] possunt, quam Madvig: possent V.
[4] Quirites Novák: que V.
[5] iis Kreyssig: his V.
[6] gerendis rebus, qui loca Sigonius: gerendis loco V.

now especially in this war no one is so scornful of rumour that his spirit cannot be weakened. In all the clubs and even—God save us!—at dinner-tables there are experts who lead armies to Macedonia, who know where camp should be pitched, what places should be held with garrisons, when or by what pass Macedonia should be invaded, where granaries should be set up, by what routes on land or sea provisions should be supplied, when we must join battle with the enemy and when it is better to remain inactive. Not only do they decide what should be done, but when anything is done contrary to their opinion, they accuse the consul as if he were in the dock. Such behaviour is a great obstacle to the men in the field. For not everyone is as unwavering and as steadfast of spirit against hostile gossip as was Quintus Fabius, who preferred to have his independence of command lessened by popular folly rather than to neglect the best interests of the state for the sake of acclaim. I am not, fellow-citizens, one who believes that no advice may be given to leaders; nay rather I judge him to be not a sage, but haughty, who conducts everything according to his own opinion alone. What therefore is my conclusion? Generals should receive advice, in the first place from the experts who are both specially skilled in military matters and have learned from experience; secondly, from those who are on the scene of action, who see the terrain, the enemy, the fitness of the occasion, who are sharers in the danger, as it were aboard the same vessel. Thus, if there is anyone who is confident that he can advise me as to the best advantage of the state in this campaign which I am about to conduct, let him not refuse his services to B.C. 168

v.c. 586 Macedoniam mecum veniat. Nave, equo, tabernaculo, 14 viatico etiam a me iuvabitur; si quem id facere piget et [1] otium urbanum militiae laboribus praeoptat, e 15 terra ne gubernaverit. Sermonum satis ipsa praebet urbs; iis loquacitatem [2] suam contineat: nos castrensibus consiliis contentos futuros esse sciat."
16 Ab hac contione Latinis, quae pridie kal. Apriles fuerunt, in monte sacrificio rite perpetrato protinus inde et consul et praetor Cn. Octavius in Macedoniam 17 profecti sunt. Traditum memoriae est [3] maiore quam solita frequentia prosequentium consulem celebratum, ac prope certa spe ominatos esse homines, finem esse Macedonico bello maturumque reditum cum egregio triumpho consulis fore.

XXIII. Dum haec in Italia geruntur, Perseus quod iam inchoatum perficere, quia impensa pecuniae faci-enda erat, non inducebat in animum, ut Gentium Illy-2 riorum regem sibi adiungeret, hoc, postquam intrasse saltum Romanos et adesse discrimen ultimum belli animadvertit, non ultra differendum ratus, cum per [4]
Hippiam legatum trecenta argenti talenta pactus

[1] et add. ed. Par. 1573: om. V.
[2] urbs; iis loquacitatem Madvig: urbisloquacitatem V.
[3] traditum memoriae est Vahlen: traditum est memoriae est V.
[4] per add. Fr: om. V.

---

[1] Polybius XXIX. 1 (1a) also mentions Paulus' attack on the armchair generals, which President Roosevelt used effectively (New York Times, Mar. 18, 1942, p. 10). In sec. 2, cf. the note on the text, it is possible that there was a reference to Paulus' reluctance to assume the consulship in this year, a reluctance to which Plutarch, Aemilius x f., refers both as a fact and as an item in Paulus' speech.

the state, but come with me into Macedonia. I will B.C. 168 furnish him with his sea-passage, with a horse, a tent, and even travel-funds. If anyone is reluctant to do this and prefers the leisure of the city to the hardships of campaigning, let him not steer the ship from on shore. The city itself provides enough subjects for conversation; let him confine his garrulity to these; and let him be aware that I shall be satisfied with the advice originating in camp." [1]

After this address and the due completion of the sacrifice at the Latin Festival, which was held on March 31 [2] on the Alban Mount, both the consul and the praetor Gnaeus Octavius immediately set out for Macedonia. History records that the consul was escorted by an unusually great throng of persons paying their respects to him, and that men prophesied with almost sure expectation that the Macedonian war would come to an end, and that the return of the consul would be prompt and in great triumph.

XXIII. While these events were occurring in Italy, Perseus decided that since he had discovered that the Romans had entered the pass and that the final crisis of the war impended, he must no longer postpone the project which he could not bring himself to complete because expenditure of money was required—namely, gaining the adherence of Gentius, king of Illyria. Inasmuch as Perseus had agreed through his envoy Hippias [3] on a payment of three

[2] The date had been set for two weeks later, according to xix. 4 above; it seems unlikely that the date, once announced, could have been advanced, and there is probably a confusion in the text between Ides and Kalends either here or above.

[3] Not named by Livy in his description of an earlier stage of the negotiations in XLIII. xx. In the present passage, Livy is following Polybius XXIX. 3–4.

A.U.C. 586

esset, ita ut obsides ultro citroque darentur, Pantauchum[1] misit ex fidissimis amicis ad ea perficienda. 3 Meteone[2] Labeatidis terrae Pantauchus regi Illyrio occurrit; ibi et iusiurandum ab rege et obsides accepit. Missus et a Gentio est legatus nomine Olympio, qui iusiurandum a Perseo obsidesque 4 exigeret. Cum eodem ad pecuniam accipiendam missi sunt; et auctore Pantaucho, qui Rhodum legati cum Macedonibus irent Parmenio et Morcus desti- 5 nantur.[3] Quibus ita mandatum ut iureiurando obsidibusque et pecunia accepta tum demum Rhodum proficiscerentur: duorum simul regum nomine 6 incitari Rhodios ad bellum Romanum posse. Adiunctam civitatem penes quam unam tum rei navalis gloria esset nec terra nec mari spem relicturam Romanis.

7 Venientibus Illyriis Perseus ab Elpeo[4] amni ex castris cum omni equitatu profectus ad Dium occurrit. 8 Ibi ea quae convenerant[5] circumfuso agmine equitum facta, quos adesse foederi sanciendo[6] cum Gentio societatis volebat rex, aliquantum eam rem ratus 9 animorum iis adiecturam. Et obsides in conspectu omnium dati acceptique; et Pellam ad thensauros regios missis qui pecuniam acciperent, qui Rhodum irent cum Illyriis legatis Thessalonicae conscendere 10 iussi. Ibi Metrodorus erat, qui nuper ab Rhodo venerat, auctoribusque Dinone[7] et Polyarato, prin-

[1] Pantauchum J. F. Gronovius: pantaucum V: et alibi in hoc nomine alia errata apparent, quae non notabimus.
[2] Meteone Kreyssig: mitione V.
[3] destinantur J. F. Gronovius: destinatur V.
[4] Elpeo Madvig: Enipeo V.
[5] convenerant J. F. Gronovius: convenerunt V.
[6] sanciendo Gitlbauer: sancio V.
[7] Dinone J. F. Gronovius: Dione V, et alibi.

hundred talents of silver, on condition of an exchange B.C. 168 of hostages, he sent Pantauchus, one of his most trusty friends, to complete the agreement. At Meteon in the region of Labeatis, Pantauchus met the Illyrian king; there he received the king's oath and his hostages. Gentius too sent an envoy named Olympio to require the oath and the hostages of Perseus. Others were sent with him to receive the money; and, at Pantauchus' suggestion, Parmenio and Morcus were named as envoys to go with the Macedonians to Rhodes. To them instructions were given to set out for Rhodes only after the oath, the hostages, and the money had been received; it was thought that by the prestige of two kings at once the Rhodians could be induced to war with the Romans, and that once the kings were joined by the state to which belonged a unique reputation for sea-power, no hope on land or sea would be left the Romans.

On the arrival of the Illyrians, Perseus left his camp at the Elpeüs River with all his cavalry and met them at Dium. There the terms agreed upon were executed in the presence of the surrounding column of cavalry, whom the king wished to be present at the ratification of the alliance with Gentius, thinking that it would somewhat raise their spirits. The hostages were also given and received in the sight of all, those who were to receive the money were sent to the royal treasury at Pella and those who were to accompany the Illyrian envoys to Rhodes were ordered to take ship at Thessalonica. Metrodorus [1] was at that port, a recent arrival from Rhodes, who stated, on the authority of Dinon and Polyaratus, the [1] A Rhodian, agent of the pro-Macedonian party.

A.U.C. 586

cipibus civitatis eius, adfirmabat Rhodios paratos ad bellum esse. Is princeps iunctae cum Illyriis legationis datus est.

XXIV. Eodem tempore et ad Eumenen et ad Antiochum communia mandata, quae subicere condicio rerum poterat: natura inimica inter se esse liberam civitatem et regem. Singulos populum Romanum adgredi et, quod indignum sit,[1] regum viribus reges oppugnare. Attalo adiutore patrem suum oppressum: Eumene adiuvante et quadam ex parte etiam Philippo, patre suo, Antiochum oppugnatum: in se nunc et Eumenen et Prusian armatos esse. Si Macedoniae regnum sublatum foret, proximam Asiam esse, quam iam ex parte sub specie liberandi civitates[2] suam fecerint, deinde Syriam. Iam Prusiam Eumeni honore praeferri, iam Antiochum victorem ab Aegypto, praemio belli,[3] arceri. Haec cogitantem providere iubebat, ut aut ad pacem secum faciendam compelleret Romanos aut perseverantes in bello iniusto communes duceret omnium regum hostes.

Ad Antiochum aperta mandata erant; ad Eumenen per speciem captivorum redimendorum missus legatus erat; re[4] vera occultiora quaedam agebantur, quae in praesentia invisum quidem et suspectum Romanis

[1] quod indignum Novák: quo indignus V.
[2] liberandi civitates Madvig: liberanda civitatis V.
[3] Aegypto, praemio belli Vahlen: praemio belli ab egypto V.
[4] re add. Koch: om. V.

---

[1] They were heads of the pro-Macedonian party, but Livy may exaggerate their official position.

heads of the state,[1] that the Rhodians were ready for war. Metrodorus was assigned as the leader of the combined embassy with the Illyrians. B.C. 168

XXIV. At the same time, identical messages, suggested by the state of affairs, were sent both to Eumenes and to Antiochus, as follows: by nature a free state and a king were things hostile to each other; the Roman people attacked kings one by one, and—an unjust state of affairs—assailed kings with the help of kings; Perseus' father had been overcome with the aid of Attalus; with Eumenes helping, and to a certain extent Perseus' father Philip as well, Antiochus had been assailed [2]; now both Eumenes and Prusias were in arms against Perseus; if the kingdom of Macedonia were out of the way, next would come Asia Minor, which the Romans had already made their own to some extent under pretext of freeing communities, and after Asia Minor, Syria. Already Prusias was being given a position above Eumenes, already Antiochus, though victorious, was being barred from Egypt, his prize of war. Perseus bade each king, on considering these facts, to take such steps that either he might force the Romans to make peace with Perseus, or if Rome persevered in an unjust war might regard the Romans as the common enemy of all kings.

The message to Antiochus was open; to Eumenes the envoy was sent under guise of ransoming prisoners, but in fact certain more secret matters were under discussion, which for the time being embarrassed Eumenes, who was already an object of

[2] On Attalus, see above, XXIX. xii. 14 and XXXI. xiv; for Eumenes, XXXV. xiii; XXXVI. xliv; XXXVII. xli; for Philip, XXXVII. vii.

A.U.C. 586

Eumenen falsis gravioribusque criminibus onerarunt;
8 proditor [1] enim ac prope hostis habitus, dum inter se duo reges captantes fraude et avaritia certant.
9 Cydas erat Cretensis, ex intimis Eumenis. Hic prius ad Amphipolim cum Chimaro quodam populari suo, militante apud Persea, inde postea ad Demetriadem semel cum Menecrate quodam, iterum cum Antimacho,[2] regiis ducibus, sub ipsis moenibus urbis 10 conlocutus fuerat. Herophon [3] quoque, qui tum missus est, duabus ad eundem Eumenen iam ante 11 legationibus functus erat. Quae conloquia occulta et legationes infames quidem erant, sed quid actum esset quidve inter reges convenisset, ignorabatur.
Res autem ita sese habuit.

XXV. Eumenes neque favit victoriae Persei, neque bello eam iuvare [4] in [5] animo habuit, non tam quia paternae inter eos inimicitiae erant quam ipsorum
2 odiis inter se accensae: non ea regum aemulatio, ut aequo animo Persea tantas apisci opes tantamque gloriam, quanta Romanis victis eum manebat, 3 Eumenes visurus fuerit. Cernebat et Persea iam inde ab initio belli omni modo spem pacis temptasse

[1] gravioribusque criminibus onerarunt; proditor Madvig: gravioribus proditor V.
[2] Antimacho J. F. Gronovius: anthioco V.
[3] Herophon Kreyssig: eropon V.
[4] eam iuvare Hartel: eum inuadere V.
[5] in add. Sigonius: om. V.

[1] Polybius XXIX. 7–8 (1d) calls Eumenes "most unscrupulous" and Perseus "most miserly," and says that Eumenes "was unable by his lack of scruple to get the best of Perseus' stinginess."

[2] For the negotiations at Demetrias, see above, xiii. 9, where Antimachus only is mentioned on the Macedonian side.

[3] Livy is in this chapter expanding the account of Polybius XXIX. 7–8 (1d).

hatred and suspicion to the Romans, with false and more serious charges; for he was already regarded as a traitor and almost an enemy, while the two kings with grasping hands vied with each other in guile and greed.[1] There was a Cretan, Cydas, one of Eumenes' henchmen. He had held conversations, first at Amphipolis with a certain Chimarus, a fellow-countryman who was serving in Perseus' army, then later at Demetrias, beneath the very walls of the city, once with a certain Menecrates and again with Antimachus, both of whom were officers of the king.[2] Herophon also, who was then sent by Perseus, had similarly undertaken two previous missions to Eumenes. These conversations were secret, and the missions caused bad rumours, but there was no knowledge of what had been discussed or upon what the kings had agreed. The actual state of affairs, however, was as follows. B.C. 168

XXV. Eumenes did not want a victory for Perseus, nor did he intend to assist him in winning one by military means, not so much because of the mutual hostility of their fathers, as because of the hatred engendered between himself and Perseus.[3] The jealousy of kings is such that Eumenes would not have viewed with calmness the attainment by Perseus of such great strength and prestige as awaited him if he defeated the Romans. Eumenes also perceived that from the very outset of the war Perseus had nurtured the hope of peace in every way [4] and as u.c. 586 et in dies magis, quo propior admoveretur terror, 4 nihil neque agere aliud neque cogitare; Romanos quoque, quia traheretur diutius spe ipsorum bellum, et ipsos duces et senatum, non abhorrere a finiendo 5 tam incommodo ac difficili bello. Hac utriusque partis voluntate explorata, quod fieri etiam sua sponte taedio validioris, metu infirmioris credebat posse, in eo suam operam venditare conciliandae 6 gratia pacis [1] cupiit. Nam modo ne iuvaret bello Romanos terra marique, modo pacis patrandae cum Romanis paciscebatur mercedem: ne bello interesset, mille talenta, ut pacem conciliaret, mille et quin- 7 genta.[2] In utrumque [3] non fidem modo se, sed obsides quoque dare paratum esse ostendebat.

[4] Livy now states what his presentation of facts showed before—that Perseus did not want the war, and stood on the defensive from the first, see Vol. XII. 396 and 460, notes 1, Roman suspicions and propaganda notwithstanding; the latter have influenced Livy extensively in his commentary on events.

8 Perseus ad rem inchoandam promptissimus erat cogente metu et de obsidibus accipiendis sine dilatione agebat, conveneratque ut accepti Cretam 9 mitterentur. Ubi ad pecuniae mentionem ventum erat, ibi haesitabat; et utique alteram tanti [4] nominis regibus [5] turpem ac sordidam et danti et 10 magis accipienti mercedem esse aiebat [6]; in spem Romanae pacis non recusare impensam, sed eam pecuniam perfecta re daturum, interea Samothracae 11 in templo depositurum. Ea insula cum ipsius dicionis esset, videre Eumenes nihil interesse, ibi [7]

[1] conciliandae gratia pacis Hartel: conciliandam gratiam magis V.

[2] interesset mille talenta ut pacem conciliaret mille et quingenta Zingerle: interesset ✕ et a V.

[3] in utrumque J. F. Gronovius: in utroque V.

[4] alteram tanti Madvig: alteram in tanti V.

[5] regibus Fr: regis V.

[6] aiebat Madvig: malebat V.

[7] ibi add. Crévier: om. V.

time went on had come more and more, as the threat B.C. 168 came closer, to treat and think of nothing else. Since the war was dragging on longer than the Romans had hoped, they too, their commanders, and their senate would not be averse, so Eumenes thought, to ending so disturbing and difficult a war. Having ascertained this willingness on either side, Eumenes was eager to put on sale his good offices in an effort to negotiate the peace which he thought might even come about automatically through the weariness of the stronger and the fears of the weaker side. Therefore Eumenes tried to negotiate for a reward, now for not aiding the Romans' military effort on land or sea, now for securing peace with the Romans; for his abstention from war, his price was a thousand talents,[1] for negotiating peace, fifteen hundred. He showed himself always ready not only to pledge his word to either course of action, but even to give hostages.

Perseus was very ready to undertake the attempt under pressure of fear, and as to the acceptance of hostages the discussion proceeded without delay, and it was agreed that, when accepted, the hostages should be sent to Crete. When the subject of money came up, there Perseus hesitated, and said that especially for the first alternative the payment of money was dishonourable and base for kings of so high a reputation, not only for the giver, but even more for the recipient; for the hope of peace with the Romans, he would not refuse an expenditure, but he would pay on the completion of the enterprise, and meanwhile would deposit the funds in the temple on Samothrace. Since this island was in Perseus' realm, Eumenes saw that it made no difference

[1] Polybius says five hundred.

u.c. 586 an Pellae pecunia esset; id agere, ut partem aliquam 12 praesentem ferret. Ita nequiquam inter se captati nihil praeter infamiam moverunt.[1]

XXVI. Nec haec tantum Persei per avaritiam est dimissa res, cum pecunia statuta aut [2] pacem habere per Eumenen, quae vel parte regni redimenda esset, aut deceptus [3] protrahere inimicum mercede onus-
2 tum et hostes merito ei Romanos posset facere; sed et ante Genti regis [4] parata societas et tum Gallorum effusorum per Illyricum ingens oblatum auxilium [5]
3 avaritia dimissum est. Veniebant decem milia equitum, par numerus peditum et ipsorum iungentium cursum equis et in vicem prolapsorum equitum
4 vacuos capientium ad pugnam equos. Hi pacti erant eques denos praesentes aureos, pedes quinos, mille
5 dux eorum. Venientibus his Perseus ab Elpeo [6] ex castris profectus obviam cum dimidia copiarum parte denuntiare per vicos urbesque quae viae propinquae sunt coepit ut commeatus expedirent,
6 frumenti, vini, pecorum ut copia esset. Ipse equos

[1] moverunt Novák: moue V.
[2] pecunia statuta aut Hartel: pecuniamtutamet V.
[3] aut deceptus J. F. Gronovius: aucreceptus V.
[4] sed et ante Genti regis Bekker: sed tam tegenti regis V.
[5] auxilium add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[6] Elpeo Madvig: Elpeio V.

---

[1] These people may have been much the same as the Bastarnae of XL. v. 10 and lvii, cf. also XLI. xix. 3–11. The name of the leader, Clondicus, is the same here and in XL. lviii. 8, which makes it sound like a title rather than a proper name. In Polybius XXV. 6 (XXVI. 9), there is a reference to the Bastarnae joining Perseus and the Gauls (Paton's interpretation), which has led some scholars to think that Polybius was referring to the Bastarnae as Gauls (Galatai) here.

whether the money was there or at Pella; he B.C. 168 attempted to secure some sort of down payment. And so having tried vainly to overreach each other, the kings got themselves nothing but a bad reputation.

XXVI. This was not the only failure incurred by Perseus because of miserliness, when by payment of money he could either through Eumenes' efforts have secured peace, which he should have bought even at the price of part of his kingdom, or had he been deceived, he could have exposed his enemy with the booty on him and aroused just hostility toward him on the part of the Romans. But a previous parallel case was that of the alliance with King Gentius, ready for the taking; and at this same time Perseus lost through miserliness the tremendous assistance of the Gauls who were scattered through the region of Illyria.[1] There were on their way ten thousand cavalry and an equal number of infantry who matched their pace to that of the horses, and in turn seized the riderless horses of fallen cavalrymen for further fighting. These men had been pledged a cash payment of ten gold pieces per cavalryman, five per infantryman, and a thousand for their leader. When they approached, Perseus went to meet them from his camp at the Elpeüs with half of his forces and began to give orders throughout the villages and cities near the road to bring out provisions so that there would be plenty of grain, wine, and animals. He Properly, the Bastarnae were Germans rather than Gauls, as was recognized soon after Livy's time, cf. Strabo VII. 306, Pliny, N.H. IV. 81, Tacitus, Germania 46. The location of the Bastarnae was to the north-east of the location here suggested for these Gauls, but cf. below, xxvii. 3.

B.C. 586

phalerasque et sagula donum principibus ferre et parvum auri, quod inter paucos divideret, multitu-7 dinem credens trahi spe posse. Ad Almanam urbem pervenit et in ripa fluminis Axi posuit castra. Circa Desudabam in Maedica exercitus Gallorum con-
8 sederat, mercedem pactam opperiens. Eo mittit Antigonum, ex purpuratis unum, qui iuberet multitudinem Gallorum ad Bylazora—Paeoniae is locus est—castra movere, principes ad se venire frequentes. Septuaginta quinque milia ab Axio flumine et castris
9 regis aberant. Haec mandata ad eos cum pertulisset Antigonus adiecissetque, per quantam omnium[1] praeparatam cura regis copiam ituri[2] forent quibusque muneribus principes advenientes vestis, argenti equorumque excepturus rex esset, de his 10 quidem se coram cognituros respondent, illud quod praesens pepigisset, interrogant, ecquid aurum, quod in singulos pedites equitesque dividendum esset,
11 secum advexisset.[3] Cum ad id nihil responderetur, Clondicus, regulus eorum, "abi renuntia ergo" inquit "regi nisi aurum obsidesque accepissent, nusquam inde Gallos longius vestigium moturos."
12 Haec relata regi cum essent advocato consilio cum quid omnes suasuri essent appareret, ipse pecuniae quam regni melior custos institit de perfidia et feritate Gallorum disserere, multorum iam ante

[1] adiecissetque, per quantam omnium Madvig: adiecisset quae per quem quantâ omnium V.
[2] ituri Madvig: intuli V.
[3] advexisset J. F. Gronovius: adduxisset V.

---

[1] Probably on the mid-Strymon.

himself brought horses, breast-ornaments, and capes B.C. 168 as presents for the chief men, and a small amount of gold to distribute among a few, supposing that the rank and file could be led along by expectations. He reached the city of Almana and pitched camp on the banks of the Axius River. The force of Gauls halted near Desudaba in Maedica,[1] waiting for their promised pay. Thither Perseus sent Antigonus, one of the wearers of the purple, to order the rank and file of the Gauls to shift camp to Bylazora (this is a place in Paeonia) and the leaders to come in a body to him. The Gauls were seventy-five miles from the Axius River and the king's camp. Antigonus carried this message to them and added an account of the abundance of all supplies prepared through the thoughtfulness of the king, through which they would travel, and of the gifts of garments, silver, and horses with which the king proposed to greet their leaders on their arrival. The Gauls replied that they would certainly find out about these matters from personal observation, but they asked about what had been promised for immediate delivery—whether he had brought with him the gold which was to be distributed among the individual horsemen and footmen. When they received no reply on this point, Clondicus, their chieftain, declared: "Go back then and report to the king that the Gauls will not move a step farther unless they receive the gold and hostages."

When this message was reported to the king, he summoned his council, but when it became clear what everyone would advise, the king, a trustier guardian of his cash than of his kingdom, began to discourse on the treachery and savagery of the Gauls, which had been demonstrated long since by disasters

a.u.c. 586

13 cladibus experta: periculosum esse tantam multitudinem in Macedoniam accipere, ne[1] graviores eos
14 socios habeant quam hostes Romanos. Quinque milia equitum satis esse, quibus et uti ad bellum possent, et quorum multitudinem ipsi non timeant.

XXVII. Apparebat omnibus[2] mercedem eum[3] timere nec quicquam aliud; sed cum suadere consulenti nemo auderet, remittitur Antigonus qui nuntiaret quinque milium equitum opera tantum uti
2 regem, non tenere[4] multitudinem aliam. Quod ubi audivere barbari, ceterorum quidem fremitus fuit indignantium se frustra excitos sedibus suis; Clondicus rursus interrogat, ecquid ipsis quinque milibus,
3 quod convenisset, numeraret? cum adversus id quoque misceri ambages cerneret, inviolato fallaci nuntio, quod vix speraverat ipse posse contingere, retro ad Histrum perpopulati Thraciam, qua vicina
4 erat viae, redierunt. Quae manus, quieto sedente rege ad Elpeum[5] adversus Romanos, per[6] Perrhaebiae saltum in Thessaliam traducta non agros tantum nudare populando potuit, ne quos inde Romani com-
5 meatus expectarent, sed ipsas excindere urbes tenente ad Elpeum Perseo Romanos, ne urbibus sociis
6 opitulari possent. Ipsis quoque Romanis de se cogitandum fuisset, quando neque manere amissa Thessalia, unde exercitus alebatur, potuissent, neque

[1] ne add. Fr: om. V.
[2] omnibus Florebellus: in omnibus V.
[3] eum H. J. Müller: multitudinem V.
[4] tenere Kreyssig: temnere V.
[5] Elpeum Madvig: enipeum V.
[6] per add. Gruter: om. V.

to many people; it was dangerous, he said, to receive B.C. 168 such large numbers into Macedonia, for fear that they would find the Gauls more deadly as allies than the Romans were as enemies; a force of five thousand cavalry was sufficient, for these they could use for military purposes and would not themselves be overawed by their numbers.

XXVII. It was obvious to everyone that he was troubled about the pay and nothing else; but as no one dared to give him the advice he asked for, Antigonus was sent back to announce that the king could use the services of five thousand cavalry only, and would not keep the rest of the host. When the barbarians heard this, there was an indignant outcry from the remainder that they had been to no purpose lured away from their homes. Clondicus again asked whether he would pay what had been agreed upon to these five thousand; and when he saw that to this, too, a devious reply was being concocted, the Gauls returned to the Danube, without injury to the messenger who had tricked them (a fate he had hardly hoped could befall him), but plundering that part of Thrace which adjoined their route. This force of Gauls, even had the king remained inactive at the Elpeüs before the Romans, could if brought into Thessaly through the pass of Perrhaebia have not only stripped the fields by their ravages, so that the Romans could have looked for no provisions from there, but could even have stormed cities as long as Perseus held the Romans at the Elpeüs, in order to prevent their rescuing the cities of their allies. The Romans would have had to consider their own plight, since they could neither remain if Thessaly, the army's source of supplies, were lost, nor could they advance progredi, cum ex adverso castra Macedonum essent.

7 Hoc amisso auxilio Perseus animos Macedonum,[1] qui ea pependerant spe, haud mediocriter debilitavit.
8 Eadem avaritia Gentium regem sibi alienavit.
Nam cum trecenta talenta Pellae missis a Gentio 9 numerasset, signare eos pecuniam passus est[2]; inde decem talenta ad Pantauchum missa, eaque praesentia dari regi iussit: reliquam pecuniam signatam
Illyriorum signo portantibus suis praecipit, parvis
10 itineribus veherent, dein cum ad finem Macedoniae ventum esset, subsisterent ibi ac nuntios ab se 11 opperirentur. Gentius exigua parte pecuniae accepta cum adsidue a[3] Pantaucho ad lacessendos hostili facto Romanos stimularetur, M. Perpennam et L. Petilium legatos, qui tum forte ad eum venerant, 12 in custodiam coniecit. Hoc audito Perseus contraxisse eum necessitatem[4] ratus ad bellandum[5] utique cum Romanis, ad revocandum qui pecuniam portabat misit, velut nihil aliud agens quam ut quanta maxima posset praeda ex se[6] victo Romanis reservaretur.
13 Et ab Eumene Herophon[7] ignotis, quae occulte acta erant, redit. De captivis actum esse et ipsi evolgaverant et Eumenes consulem vitandae sus-picionis causa certiorem fecit.

XXVIII. Perseus post reditum ab Eumene Herophontis spe deiectus Antenorem et Callippum prae-

[1] essent. Hoc amisso auxilio Perseus animos Macedonum add. Madvig: om. V.
[2] est add. ed. Bas. 1535: om. V.
[3] a add. Sigonius: om. V.
[4] eum necessitatem Doering: umenecessitatis V.
[5] bellandum Vahlen: bellum V.
[6] se Kreyssig: edicto V.
[7] Herophon Kreyssig: Hieroponimo V.

while the camp of the Macedonians lay before them. B.C. 168
By losing this added strength, Perseus weakened to no small degree the morale of the Macedonians, who had been depending on this source of hope.

The same miserliness caused a rift with Gentius. For when Perseus had counted out three hundred talents for the envoys sent by Gentius to Pella, he permitted them to affix their seal to the money; then he sent ten talents to Pantauchus and ordered this paid at once to the king. His own people were transporting the rest of the money marked with the seal of the Illyrians, and he ordered them to convey it by short stages, and then when the Macedonian frontier was reached, to halt there and wait for messengers from him. After Gentius had received a scant portion of the money, he was continually spurred on by Pantauchus to assail the Romans with an act of hostility, and so he threw into prison Marcus Perpenna and Lucius Petilius, the ambassadors who happened to reach him at this time.[1] On hearing of this Perseus thought that Gentius had committed himself to fight the Romans in any case, and sent a recall to the one conveying the money, as if his only concern was to save as much booty as possible for the Romans after his own defeat.

Herophon also returned from the court of Eumenes, the secret negotiations being still unrevealed. The Macedonians spread the word that discussion about prisoners had taken place, and Eumenes, to avoid suspicion, informed the consul to this same effect.

XXVIII. After the disappointment of Herophon's return from the court of Eumenes, Perseus sent Antenor and Callippus, his naval commanders, with [1] See below, xxxii. 2.

u.c. 586

fectos classis cum quadraginta lembis—adiectae ad hunc numerum quinque pristes erant—Tenedum 2 mittit, ut inde sparsas [1] per Cycladas insulas naves, Macedoniam cum frumento petentes, tutarentur. 3 Cassandreae deductae naves in portus primum, qui sub Atho monte sunt, inde Tenedum placido mari cum traiecissent, stantis in portu Rhodias apertas naves Eudamumque, praefectum earum, inviolatos [2] 4 atque etiam benigne appellatos dimiserunt. Cognito deinde in latere altero quinquaginta onerarias suarum stantibus in ostio portus Eumenis rostratis, quibus 5 Damius praeerat, inclusas esse, circumvectus propere ac summotis terrore hostium navibus, onerarias datis qui prosequerentur decem lembis in Macedoniam mittit, ita ut in tutum [3] prosecuti redirent Tenedum. 6 Nono post die ad classem iam ad Sigeum [4] stantem redierunt. Inde Subota—insula est interiecta 7 Elaeae et Chio [5]—traiciunt. Forte postero die quam Subota classis tenuit quinque et triginta naves, quas hippagogus vocant, ab Elaea profectae cum equitibus Gallis equisque Phanas promunturium Chiorum petebant, unde transmittere in Macedoniam possent. 8 Attalo ab Eumene mittebantur. Has naves per altum ferri cum ex specula signum datum Antenori esset, profectus ab [6] Subotis inter Erythrarum promunturium Chiumque, qua artissimum fretum est,

[1] sparsas Drakenborch: sparsae V.
[2] inviolatos J. F. Gronovius: inviolatus V.
[3] tutum Vascosanus: totum V.
[4] Sigeum Sigonius: sigrium V.
[5] Elaeae et Chio Madvig: eleae etho V.
[6] ab Kreyssig: ac V.

forty scout-ships—there were five cutters [1] added to B.C. 168 this number—to Tenedos, in order to protect from that base the ships scattered through the Cyclades islands on their way to Macedonia with grain. The ships were launched at Cassandrea, and after crossing first to the harbours under Mount Athos and thence on a calm sea to Tenedos, they sent away unharmed and even with kind addresses some undecked Rhodian ships which were at the port with Eudamus their commander. Then Antenor discovered that on the other side of the island fifty of their freight ships were blockaded by warships of Eumenes, under command of Damius, which were stationed at the mouth of the harbour. Antenor promptly sailed around and by threat caused the enemy ships to retreat; the freight ships were sent to Macedonia under convoy of ten scout-ships, which were instructed to return to Tenedos after seeing them safe. On the ninth day thereafter they returned to the fleet, which was now anchored at Sigeum. Thence they crossed to Subota, an island lying between Elaea and Chios. On the day after the arrival of the fleet at Subota, thirty-five of the ships called horse-transports, setting out from Elaea with Galatian cavalry and their mounts, were making for Phanae, a cape of Chios, from which they could cross to Macedonia. They were being sent to Attalus by Eumenes. When a signal reached Antenor from a lookout post that these ships were at sea, he started from Subota and met them between the cape of Erythrae and Chios, where [1] Cf. XXXV. xxvi. 1, Polybius XVI. 2. 9 and XVIII (XVII) 1. 1, lumps these pristes with the lembi as light fighting vessels. Livy, quoting from the latter passage of Polybius, translates pristis by "beaked ship," XXXII. xxxii. 9.

r.c. 586

9 iis occurrit. Nihil minus credere praefecti Eumenis quam Macedonum classem in illo vagari mari: nunc Romanos esse, nunc Attalum aut remissos aliquos ab 10 Attalo ex castris Romanis Pergamum petere. Sed cum iam adproprinquantium forma lemborum haud dubia esset et concitatio remorum derectaeque in se prorae [1] hostis adpropinquare aperuissent,[2] tunc 11 iniecta trepidatio est. Cum resistendi spes nulla esset inhabilique navium genere et Gallis vix quietem 12 ferentibus in mari, pars eorum qui propiores continentis [3] litori erant in Erythraeam enarunt, pars velis datis ad Chium naves eiecere relictisque equis effusa 13 fuga urbem petebant. Sed propius urbem lembi accessuque commodiore cum exposuissent armatos, partim in via fugientes Gallos adepti Macedones ceciderunt, partim ante portam exclusos. Clauserant enim Chii portas ignari,[4] qui fugerent aut sequeren- 14 tur. Octingenti ferme Gallorum occisi, ducenti vivi capti; equi pars in mari fractis navibus absumpti, parti [5] nervos succiderunt in litore Macedones. 15 Viginti eximiae equos formae cum captivis eosdem decem lembos, quos ante miserat, Antenor devehere Thessalonicam iussit et primo quoque tempore ad

[1] prorae Fr: prope V.
[2] aperuissent Turnebus: apparuissent V.
[3] continentis J. F. Gronovius: continenti V.
[4] Chii portas ignari Madvig: chio partā signari V.
[5] parti Kreyssig: partim V.

---

[1] The move by Eumenes to add to Attalus' force indicates that Livy's charges of treachery against Eumenes were none too well founded. The exact course of the action described is not clear from the account in Livy's usual impressionistic manner; but the Macedonian ships seem to have let the transports pass the strait is narrowest. Eumenes' officers least of B.C. 168 all suspected that a Macedonian fleet was at large in that sea; now they thought them to be Romans, now Attalus, or some men sent back by Attalus from the Roman camp and on their way to Pergamum. But when the shape of the approaching scout-ships was unmistakable and the rapid motion of the oars and the pointing of the prows head-on revealed that enemies were approaching, then panic fell upon them. Since there was no hope of resistance, both because of the unwieldly type of vessel and because the Galatians could hardly withstand an undisturbed voyage, some of them, who were nearer to the mainland, swam ashore at Erythrae and some set sail for Chios, ran their ships aground, and abandoning their horses fled in rout to the city. But as the scout-ships put troops ashore nearer the city at a more convenient landing-place, the Macedonians overtook the Galatians and cut them down, partly as they fled along the road and partly when they were shut out of the city gates. For the Chians had closed their gates, not knowing who were fleeing or who pursuing.[1] About eight hundred of the Galatians were killed and two hundred taken alive; some of the horses were destroyed in the sea as the ships were wrecked, some were hamstrung on shore by the Macedonians. Antenor ordered twenty horses of exceptional beauty, along with the prisoners, to be taken to Thessalonica by the same ten scout-ships he had sent before, which he ordered to return as soon as possible

Subota, wherever that was, and then pursued, overtaking them between Phanae, the cape and harbour at the south end of Chios (cf. above, XXXVI. xliii. 11 and Strabo XIV. 1. 35) and Chios city. The Chians were allies of Rome.

a.u.c. 586 classem reverti; Phanis se eos expectaturum. Tri-16 duum ferme classis ad urbem stetit.[1] Phanas inde progressi sunt et spe celerius regressis decem lembis [2] evecti Aegaeo mari Delum traiecerunt.

XXIX. Dum haec geruntur, legati Romani, C. Popilius et C. Decimius et C. Hostilius, a Chalcide profecti tribus quinqueremibus Delum cum venissent, lembos ibi Macedonum quadraginta et quinque regis
2 Eumenis quinqueremis invenerunt. Sanctitas templi insulaeque inviolatos praestabat omnes. Itaque permixti Romanique et Macedones et Eumenis navales socii in [3] templo indutias religione loci prae-
3 bente versabantur. Antenor, Persei praefectus, cum aliquas alto praeferri onerarias naves ex speculis
4 significatum foret, parte lemborum ipse insequens, parte per Cyclades disposita, praeterquam si quae Macedoniam peterent, omnes aut supprimebat aut spoliabat naves. Quibus poterat Popilius aut suis [4]
5 aut Eumenis navibus succurrebat; sed evecti [5] nocte binis aut ternis plerumque lembis Macedones fallebant.

6 Per id fere tempus legati Macedones Illyriique simul Rhodum venerunt, quibus auctoritatem addidit non lemborum modo adventus passim per Cycladas atque Aegaeum vagantium mare, sed etiam coniunctio ipsa regum Persei Gentique et fama cum magno numero peditum equitumque venientium Gallorum.
7 Et iam cum accessissent animi Dinoni [6] ac Polyarato,

[1] stetit add. Fr: om. V.
[2] regressis decem lembis Madvig: ingressis ex lembis V.
[3] in Fr: et in V.
[4] aut suis add. Hertz: om. V.
[5] evecti Duker: vecti V.
[6] animi Dinoni J. F. Gronovius: animinoni V.

to the fleet; he said he would await them at Phanae. B.C. 168
For about three days the fleet anchored before the city. Then they moved on to Phanae, and setting sail on the unexpectedly early arrival of the ten scout-ships, crossed the Aegean Sea to Delos.

XXIX. While these events were taking place, the Roman envoys,[1] Gaius Popilius, Gaius Decimius, and Gaius Hostilius, set out from Chalcis in three five-banked ships and on arriving at Delos found there forty Macedonian scout-ships and five five-bankers of King Eumenes. The holiness of the temple and the island kept them all from harm. And so the Roman, the Macedonian, and Eumenes' sailors mingled in the temple under the truce provided by the sacredness of the place. Whenever signals came from the lookouts that any freight-ships were passing out at sea, Antenor, Perseus' officer, would himself pursue with some ships, while others of his ships were distributed among the Cyclades, and either sank or plundered every ship not sailing for Macedonia. Popilius would come to the rescue with what ships he had either of his own or Eumenes'; but the Macedonians would evade him by sailing at night mostly in groups of two or three ships.

At about this same time, the envoys from Macedonia and Illyria arrived together at Rhodes, and weight was lent their words not only by the arrival of the scout-ships roaming all around the Cyclades and the Aegean Sea, but also by the very fact of the combination between the kings Perseus and Gentius, and the rumour of the arrival of the Gauls in great numbers both of infantry and cavalry. Since, then, the boldness of Dinon and Polyaratus, who sided with

[1] To Alexandria, cf. xix. 13.

c.c. 86 qui Persei partium erant, non benigne modo responsum regibus est, sed[1] palam pronuntiatum bello 8 finem se auctoritate sua imposituros esse; itaque ipsi quoque reges aequos adhiberent animos ad pacem accipiendam.

XXX. Iam veris principium erat novique duces in provincias[2] venerant, consul Aemilius in Macedoniam, Octavius Oreum ad classem, Anicius in Illyricum, cui
2 bellandum adversus Gentium erat. Gentius[3] patre Pleurato, rege Illyriorum, et matre Eurydica genitus fratres duos, Platorem utroque parente, Caravantium
3 matre eadem natum, habuit. Hoc propter ignobilitatem paternam minus suspecto Platorem occidit et duos amicos eius, Ettritum et Epicadum, impigros
4 viros, quo tutius regnaret. Fama fuit Monuni,[4] Dardanorum principis, filiam Etutam[5] pacto fratri eum invidisse, tamquam his nuptiis adiungenti sibi Dardanorum gentem: et simillimum[6] id vero fecit
5 ducta ea virgo Platore interfecto. Gravis deinde dempto a[7] fratre metu popularibus esse coepit; et violentiam insitam ingenio intemperantia vini accen-
6 debat. Ceterum, sicut ante dictum est, ad Romanum incitatus bellum Lissum omnis copias contraxit.
7 Quindecim milia armatorum fuerunt. Inde fratre in [1] sed add. Fr: om. V.

[2] provincias Kreyssig: provinciam V.
[3] erat. Gentius add. Madvig: om. V.
[4] Monuni Zeitschr. f. Altertumswissensch. 1836 p. 833: honuni V. [5] Etutam Fr: metutam V.
[6] simillimum Kreyssig: simillium V.
[7] a add. Vahlen: om. V.

[1] Livy is following Polybius XXIX. 11 (5). Polybius says that the loss of Eumenes' cavalry impressed the Rhodians, but does not mention the Gauls from the North; he does not make the Rhodians sound as cock-sure as does Livy.

Perseus, was on the increase, not only was a cordial response given to the kings, but the flat statement was made that the Rhodians would by their influence bring an end to the war, and that therefore the kings themselves should make up their minds calmly to accept peace.[1] B.C. 168

XXX. By now spring was beginning [2] and the new commanders arrived in the field, the consul Aemilius in Macedonia, Octavius with the fleet at Oreüs, and in the region of Illyria, Anicius, whose task was the campaign against Gentius.[3] This king, the son of Pleuratus, king of the Illyrians, and Eurydice, had two brothers, Plator, a full brother, and Caravantius, born of the same mother. The latter Gentius suspected less because of the obscurity of his father, but the king killed Plator and two friends of his, Ettritus and Epicadus, energetic men, for the greater security of his reign. The rumour was that he envied his brother his betrothal to Etuta, daughter of Monunius the chieftain of the Dardani, since by this marriage Plator would secure the support of the Dardani; and Gentius made this really very probable by marrying the girl after the murder of Plator. Once the fear of his brother was removed, Gentius began to be oppressive to his people, and the violence innate in his character was inflamed by overuse of wine. However, when he had been stirred up to fight the Romans, as has been related above, he collected all his forces at Lissus. These were fifteen thousand men. From there he sent his brother with [2] It was late April by the then Roman calendar, but actually early February, see below, xxxvii. 5–9.

[3] The characterization of Gentius is based on Polybius XXIX. 13 (5).

u.c. 586 Caviorum gentem vi aut terrore subigendam cum mille peditibus et quinquaginta equitibus misso, ipse ad Bassaniam urbem quinque milia ab Lisso ducit. 8 Socii erant Romanorum: itaque per praemissos [1] nuntios prius temptati obsidionem pati quam dedere 9 sese maluerunt. Caravantium in Caviis Durnium oppidum advenientem benigne accepit; Caravandis, altera urbs, exclusit; et agros eorum cum [2] effuse vastaret, aliquot palati milites agrestium concursu 10 interfecti sunt. Iam et Ap. Claudius adsumptis ad eum exercitum quem habebat Bullinorum [3] et Apolloniatium et Dyrrachinorum auxiliis profectus ex hibernis circa Genusum [4] amnem castra habebat, 11 audito foedere inter Persea et Gentium et legatorum violatorum iniuria accensus, bellum haud dubie 12 adversus eum gesturus. Anicius praetor eo tempore Apolloniae auditis quae in Illyrico gererentur praemissisque ad Appium litteris, ut se ad Genusum opperiretur, triduo et ipse in castra venit et ad ea 13 quae habebat auxilia a Parthinorum iuventute adiunctis duobus [5] milibus peditum et equitibus ducentis—peditibus Epicadus, equitibus Algalsus praeerat—parabat ducere in Illyricum, maxime ut Bassanitas solveret obsidione. Tenuit impetum eius 14 fama lemborum vastantium maritimam oram. Octoginta erant lembi, auctore Pantaucho missi a Gentio

[1] praemissos Kreyssig: perremissos V.
[2] cum add. Vahlen: om. V.
[3] Bullinorum Drakenborch: bullaniorum V.
[4] Genusum Turnebus: genuussuum V.

a thousand infantry and fifty cavalry to subdue the B.C. 168 tribe of the Cavii either by force or threats, while he himself advanced from Lissus five miles to the city of Bassania. The inhabitants were allied to the Romans; and so when overtures were made by messengers sent ahead of Gentius, they preferred to stand siege rather than to surrender. As Caravantius arrived among the Cavii, the town of Durnium received him hospitably; Caravandis, another city, shut him out; and while he was ravaging their territory far and wide, a few scattered soldiers were killed by the rallying farmers. By now Appius Claudius too had added auxiliaries of the Bullini and the citizens of Apollonia and Dyrrachium to the army he had with him, and had set out from winter quarters to a camp by the Genusus River, since he had heard of the treaty between Perseus and Gentius and was incensed by the mistreatment of the molested envoys, so that he was bent on campaigning against Gentius. About this time Anicius the praetor heard at Apollonia of affairs in the region of Illyria, and sending ahead orders to Appius to wait for him at the Genusus, he himself arrived in camp in three days. He added to the auxiliaries he had two thousand infantry and two hundred cavalry of the young men of the Parthini—Epicadus commanded the infantry, Algalsus the cavalry—and made ready to march into the region of Illyria, especially in order to relieve the siege of Bassania. His urgency was restrained by a rumour of scout-ships ravaging the coast. There were eighty of these ships, sent by Gentius at the suggestion of Pantauchus to plunder

[5] auxilia a Parthinorum iuventute adiunctis duobus Madvig: auxiliapar tinorumiuuentaduobus V.

A.U.C. 586 ad Dyrrachinorum et Apolloniatium agros populandos.
15 Tum classis ad . . . .[1] to eo tradiderunt se.

XXXI. Deinceps et urbes regionis eius idem faciebant, adiuvante inclinationem animorum clementia
2 in [2] omnis et iustitia praetoris Romani. Ad Scodram inde ventum est. quod [3] belli caput erat,[4] non eo solum quod Gentius eam sibi ceperat velut regni totius arcem sed etiam quod Labeatium gentis
3 munitissima longe est et difficilis aditu. Duo cingunt eam flumina, Clausal a latere [5] urbis quod in orientem patet praefluens, Barbanna ab regione occidentis, ex
4 Labeatide palude oriens. Hi duo amnes confluentes incidunt Oriundi flumini, quod ortum ex monte Scordo, multis et aliis auctum aquis, mari Hadriatico
5 infertur. Mons Scordus,[6] longe altissimus regionis eius, ab oriente Dardanicam [7] subiectam habet, a 6 meridie Macedoniam, ab occasu Illyricum. Quamquam munitum situ naturali oppidum erat gensque id tota Illyriorum et rex ipse tuebatur, tamen praetor Romanus, quia prima successerant prospere, fortunam totius rei principia secuturam esse ratus et repentinum valiturum terrorem, instructo exercitu
7 ad moenia succedit. Quod si clausis portis muros portarumque turris dispositi [8] armati defendissent,

[1] Hic folium unum excidit.
[2] in add. Fr: om. V.
[3] quod Kreyssig: ad quod V.
[4] caput erat Drakenborch: capotuerat V.
[5] Clausal a latere Madvig: clausalalatere V.
[6] Scordus Drakenborch: scodra et scodrus V.
[7] Dardanicam Heraeus: dardaniam V.
[8] dispositi Madvig: disposita V.

[1] Appian, Illyrian Wars ii. 9 says that Anicius "captured some of Gentius' scout-ships and then engaged him in battle on land, defeated him, and shut him up in a fortress."

the territory of Dyrrachium and Apollonia. Then a fleet at . . .[1] . . . they surrendered. B.C. 168

XXXI. Thereafter the cities of the region did the same, the turn of their thoughts being assisted by the mildness and justice of the Roman praetor. Next he arrived at Scodra, the centre of resistance not only because Gentius had appropriated it as the citadel for his whole kingdom, but also because it is the best-fortified town of the Labeate tribe, and is hard to approach. Two rivers surround it, the Clausal flowing by on the side of the city which faces eastward, the Barbanna on the west side, flowing from the Labeate Lake. (These two streams after joining fall into the Oriundes River [2] which rises on Mount Scordus, is swelled by many other streams, and falls into the Adriatic Sea. Mount Scordus, by far the highest of that region, overlooks Dardania to the eastward, Macedonia to the south, and the Illyrian region to the west.) Although the town was fortified by its surroundings and the whole nation of the Illyrians, as well as their king, was defending it, nevertheless the Roman praetor decided that since his first moves had met with success, good fortune in the campaign as a whole would follow these beginnings, and that a fast-moving threat would be efficacious; so he advanced to the wall with his army in formation. If well-placed forces had shut the gates and defended the walls and gate-towers, they

[2] This river is elsewhere called the Drilon (modern Drin); in 1858, after a period during which the Drilon emptied to the south, and the Barbanna followed its own course to the sea, the Drin, in flood, resumed the course reported by Livy, and was maintaining it, except for some water following the southern channel, about 1940 (see the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 1944, s.v. Albania).

A.U.C. 586

vano cum incepto moenibus pepulissent Romanos;
8 nunc porta egressi proelium loco aequo maiore animo
9 commiserunt quam sustinuerunt. Pulsi enim et fuga conglobati, cum ducenti amplius in ipsis faucibus portae cecidissent, tantum intulerunt terrorem ut oratores extemplo ad praetorem mitteret Gentius Teuticum et Bellum, principes gentis, per quos indutias peteret, ut deliberare de statu rerum
10 suarum posset. Triduo in hoc dato, cum castra Romana quingentos ferme passus ab urbe abessent, navem conscendit et flumine Barbanna navigat [1] in lacum Labeatum, velut secretum locum petens ad
11 consultandum, sed, ut apparuit, falsa spe excitus
12 Caravantium fratrem multis milibus armatorum coactis [2] ex ea regione in quam missus erat adventare. Qui postquam evanuit rumor, tertio post die navem eandem [3] secundo amni Scodram demisit; praemissisque nuntiis ut sibi appellandi praetoris potestas
13 fieret, copia facta in castra venit. Et principium orationis ab accusatione stultitiae orsus suae, postremo ad preces lacrimasque effusus, genibus praetoris
14 accidens in potestatem sese dedit. Primo bonum animum habere iussus, ad cenam etiam invitatus in urbem ad suos redit. Et cum praetore eo die honori-
15 fice est epulatus, deinde in custodiam C. Cassio

[1] Barbanna navigat Kreyssig: babanonauigant V.
[2] coactis J. F. Gronovius: actis V.
[3] eandem Sigonius: ad eam V.

would have routed the Romans from the wall and made their attempt worthless; as it was, they sallied from the gate and on level ground joined battle with more spirit than they maintained. For they were routed and huddled in flight, while over two hundred fell in the very mouth of the gate, and they brought in with them such panic that Gentius at once sent representatives named Teuticus and Bellus, leading men of the nation, to the praetor to ask for a truce so that the king might deliberate over his situation. When he was given three days for this purpose, he boarded a ship, since the Roman camp was about half a mile from the city, and sailed up the Barbanna River to Lake Labeate, as if seeking a secluded spot for taking council; actually, as became evident, he was stirred by an unfounded hope that his brother Caravantius[1] would arrive with many thousands of soldiers gathered in the region to which he had been sent. After the talk about this had evaporated, on the third day he brought the same ship downstream to Scodra. First sending messengers to secure an opportunity for addressing the praetor and on being given the opportunity, he came into camp. At the outset of his speech he began by blaming his own stupidity, and at the end gave himself up to entreaties and a flood of tears, and falling at the praetor's knees, put himself into his hands. Immediately he was bidden to take heart, and after being invited to dinner, returned to his own people in the city. On that day he was banqueted with marks of distinction by the praetor, and then put under the guard of Gaius Cassius, tribune of the soldiers, after B.C. 168

[1] Possibly he had gone to a different region from that mentioned in the preceding chapter, and was among friends.

A.U.C. 586

tribuno militum[1] traditus, vix gladiatorio accepto, decem talentis, ab rege rex, ut in eam fortunam recideret.

XXXII. Anicius Scodra recepta nihil prius quam requisitos Petilium Perpennamque legatos ad se duci iussit. Quibus splendore suo restituto Perpennam extemplo mittit ad conprehendendos amicos cognatosque regis; qui Meteonem, Labeatium gentis urbem, profectus Etlevam uxorem cum filiis duobus, Scerdilaedo[2] Pleuratoque, et Caravantium fratrem Scodram in castra adduxit. Anicius bello Illyrico intra triginta dies perfecto nuntium victoriae Perpennam Romam misit et post dies paucos Gentium regem ipsum cum parente, coniuge ac liberis ac fratre aliisque principibus Illyriorum. Hoc unum bellum prius perpetratum quam coeptum Romae auditum est.

Quibus diebus haec agebantur, Perseus quoque in magno terrore erat propter adventum simul Aemili novi consulis, quem cum ingentibus minis adventare audiebat, simul Octavi praetoris. Nec minus terroris a classe Romana et periculo maritumae orae habebat. Thessalonicae Eumenes et Athenagoras praeerant cum parvo praesidio duorum milium caetratorum. Eo et Androclen praefectum mittit iussum sub ipsis navalibus castra habere. Aenean mille equites et Creon Antigonensis missi[3] ad tutandam maritumam

[1] militum Fr.: pl. V.

[2] Scerdilaedo J. F. Gronovius: cerdilio V.

[3] equites et Creon Antigonensis missi Madvig: equitescreantigonensismisit V.

having received a mere ten talents, hardly the fee of a gladiator, though he was a king dealing with a king, to induce him to sink to such misfortune. B.C. 168

XXXII. On taking over Scodra, Anicius' very first order was that the ambassadors Petilius and Perpenna should be searched out and brought to him. When they had been restored to a properly dignified state, he immediately sent Perpenna to arrest the friends and relatives of the king. Perpenna set out for Meteon, the city of the Labeate tribe, and brought to camp at Scodra Etleva,[1] the queen, with her two children, Scerdilaedus and Pleuratus, and Caravantius the king's brother. After completing the Illyrian campaign within thirty days, Anicius sent Perpenna to Rome as messenger of this victory, and a few days later sent on King Gentius himself with his mother, wife, children, and brother, as well as other leading Illyrians. This campaign was unique in that its conclusion was reported at Rome before its beginning.

During the time that this was going on, Perseus also was in great fear because of the arrival not only of Aemilius the new consul, who he heard had come on the scene bringing dire threats, but also of Octavius the praetor. The king was feeling equally keenly the threat from the Roman fleet and the danger to the coastal area. At Thessalonica, Eumenes and Athenagoras were in command with a small garrison of two thousand light infantry.[2] To that place Perseus sent the officer Androcles also, under orders to encamp right by the dockyards. To Aenea a thousand cavalry under Creon of Antigonea were sent to [1] We cannot determine whether this is another queen, or whether the name Etuta in xxx. 4 refers to the same woman.

[2] Cf. XLII. li. 4 and the note.

A.U.C. 586

oram, ut quocumque litore adplicuisse naves hostium 9 audissent extemplo ferrent agrestibus opem. Quin-que milia [1] Macedonum missa ad praesidium Pythoi et Petrae, quibus praepositi erant Histiaeus et 10 Theogenes et Midon. His profectis ripam munire
Elpei fluminis adgressus est, quia sicco alveo transiri 11 poterat. Huic rei [2] ut omnis multitudo vacaret, feminae ex propinquis urbibus coactae cibaria in castra adferebant; miles iussus ex propinquis silvis benigne . . . .

XXXIII. . . . .[3] conferre, postremo sequi se utrarios ad mare. quod minus trecentos passus aberat, iussit et in litore alios alibi modicis intervallis fodere.
2 Montes ingentis altitudinis spem faciebant, eo magis quia nullos apertos emergerent [4] rivos, occultos contineri [5] latices, quorum venae in mare permanantes
3 undae miscerentur. Vix diducta [6] summa harena erat, cum scaturigines [7] turbidae primo et tenues emicare, dein liquidam multamque fundere aquam
4 velut deum dono coeperunt. Aliquantum ea quoque res duci famae et auctoritatis apud milites adicit. Iussis deinde militibus expedire arma ipse cum tribunis primisque ordinibus ad contemplandos transitus

[1] quinque milia Fr.: u V.
[2] rei add. Harant: om. V.
[3] Hic duo folia exciderunt.
[4] emergerent Georges: euergentt V.
[5] contineri Duker: continere V.
[6] diducta Drakenborch: deducta V.
[7] scaturigines ed. Bas. 1535: scaturiges V.

[1] These places guarded a pass north of Mount Olympus by which the position at the Elpeüs might have been taken in the rear.

protect the coastal area, in order to come at once to B.C. 168 the aid of the country folk at any point on the shore where they heard that enemy ships had put in. Five thousand Macedonians were sent to garrison Pythoüs and Petra,[1] the commanders being Histiaeus, Theogenes, and Midon. When these forces had left, Perseus set himself to fortifying the bank of the Elpeüs, because its dry bed could be crossed. In order that his entire force might be free for this operation, women gathered from the near-by cities brought foodstuffs into camp; the soldiers, under orders, from the woods near by generously . . .[2]

XXXIII. . . . to gather, and finally he ordered the water-carriers to follow him to the sea, which was less than three-tenths of a mile away, and to dig wells on the beach, some here, some there, at slight intervals. The immense height of the mountains,[3] especially inasmuch as they produced no visible rivers, gave him the hope that underneath were hidden streams, the veins of which trickled through to the sea and mingled with the salt water. Hardly had the uppermost sand been penetrated when jets of water spurted out, at first muddy and slight, but then proceeding to pour out, as if by a miracle, with clear and copious water. This success too gave the commander no little glory and power of leadership with the soldiers. Then when the soldiers were ordered to put their weapons in condition, the consul with the tribunes and ranking centurions went forward to reconnoitre the crossings, in order to find out where

[2] Further preparations of Perseus and the arrival of Paulus at the Roman camp were described in this gap.

[3] Plutarch, Aemilius xiv. 1, says that the green woods on the slopes indicated abundant ground-water.

A.U.C. 586

processit. qua[1] descensus facilis armatis, qua in ulteriorem ripam minime iniquus ascensus esset. His satis exploratis alia quoque novavit,[2] primum, ut ordine ac sine tumultu omnia in agmine ad nutum imperiumque ducis fierent, providit: ubi omnibus simul pronuntiaretur quid fieret neque omnes exaudirent, incerto imperio accepto alios ab se adicientes plus eo quod imperatum sit alios minus facere; clamores deinde dissonos oriri omnibus locis, et prius hostes quam ipsos quid paretur scire. Placere igitur tribunum militum primo pilo legionis secretum edere imperium, illum et dein singulos proximo cuique in ordine centurioni dicere quod opus facto sit sive a primis signis ad novissimum agmen, sive ab extremis ad primos perferendum imperium sit. Vigiles etiam novo more scutum in vigiliam ferre vetuit: non enim in pugnam vigilem ire ut armis utatur sed ad vigilandum ut, cum senserit hostium adventum, recipiat se excitetque ad arma alios. Scuto prae se erecto stare galeatos; deinde ubi fessi sint, innixos pilo, capite super marginem scuti posito, sopitos stare, ut fulgentibus armis procul conspici ab hoste possint, ipsi nihil provideant.[3] Stationum quoque morem mutavit. Armati omnes, et frenatis equis equites, diem totum perstabant; id cum aestivis diebus urente

[1] processit, qua add. Madvig: om. V.
[2] alia quoque novavit Madvig: illa quoque V.
[3] possint, ipsi nihil provideant J. F. Gronovius: possit ipse nihil provideat V.

---

[1] Centurions ranked according to their place in the formation of the legion, cf. e.g. XLII. xxxiv. 5-8.
[2] Plutarch, Aemilius xiii. 5, says a spear.

the way down was easy for men under arms and where B.C. 168 on the farther bank there was the least unfavourable way up. After gathering sufficient information on these points, he introduced other changes, too; in the first place, he saw to it that everything in the column should take place in good order and without confusion at the beck and call of the commander; when orders were given to the whole army at once and not all were within hearing, he said, some, after receiving an unclear order, made additions of their own and did more than was bidden, while others did less; hence discordant outcries arose everywhere and the enemy found out what was afoot sooner than one's own men. Therefore the consul decided that the tribune of the soldiers should first give an order privately to the chief centurion of the legion, and he and his subordinates in rank should then each tell to the next in rank [1] what was to be done, whether the order was to be passed from the head of the column to the rear, or from the last to the first. The consul also made the innovation of forbidding sentries to carry a shield [2] on post: for he said that a sentry is not going into combat to use his weapons, but is to keep on guard so that when he perceives the approach of the enemy, he may retire and rouse the others to arms. Men set the shield before them and stand there, helmet on head; then when they are tired, they lean on the spear, rest the head on the shield-rim, and stand there drowsing, so that with their shining armour they can be detected by the enemy from afar, while they themselves do not see ahead at all. The consul also changed the practice of the outposts. All were used to spending the entire day under arms, cavalry with their horses bridled; when this took adsiduo sole fieret, tot horarum aestu et languore ipsos equosque fessos integri saepe adorti hostes vel 11 pauci plures vexabant. Itaque ex matutina [1] statione ad meridiem decedi et in postmeridianam succedere alios iussit; ita numquam fatigatos recens hostis adgredi poterat.

A.U.C. 586

XXXIV. Haec cum ita fieri placere contione advocata pronuntiasset, adiecit urbanae contioni convenientem orationem:

2 Unum imperatorem in exercitu providere et consulere quid agendum sit debere, nunc per se, nunc cum iis quos advocaverit in consilium; qui non sint advocati, eos nec palam nec secreto iactare consilia
3 sua. Militem haec tria curare debere, corpus ut quam validissimum et pernicissimum habeat, arma
4 apta, cibum paratum ad subita imperia; cetera scire de se dis immortalibus et imperatori suo curae esse. In quo exercitu milites consultent, imperator rumori-
5 bus vulgi circumagatur, ibi nihil salutare esse. Se quod sit officium imperatoris provisurum ut bene gerendae rei occasionem iis praebat: illos nihil quid [2] futurum sit quaerere, ubi datum signum sit, tum militarem navare operam debere.[3]

6 Ab his praeceptis contionem dimisit, volgo etiam veteranis fatentibus se illo primum die, tamquam tirones, quid agendum esset in re militari didicisse.

[1] matutina Fr.: stativa V.
[2] quid Fr.: quod id V.
[3] operam debere add. Madvig: om. V.

place on summer days under an unremitting and burning sun, after so many hours of heat and weariness the tired men and horses were often attacked by fresh enemy troops and superior numbers thrown into confusion by even a few. So he gave orders that men on duty in the morning should be relieved at noon by a different afternoon detail; in this way a fresh enemy could never attack tired men. B.C. 168

XXXIV. After he had announced to an assembly of the soldiers the decision to adopt these measures, the consul added a speech in the vein of his address in Rome:

"There should be a single general in an army who foresees and plans what should be done, sometimes by himself, sometimes with the advisers he calls into council. Those who are not called into council should not air their own views publicly or privately. A soldier should concern himself with the following: his body, to keep it as strong and as nimble as possible; the good condition of his weapons; and the readiness of his food-supply for unexpected orders. For the rest, he should realize that the immortal gods and his general are taking care of him. In an army in which the soldiers deliberate and the general is led about by the gossip of the rank and file, conditions are utterly unsound. For my part, I shall do the duty of a general—that is, see to it that you have an opportunity for successful action. You ought not to ask what is going to happen, but when the signal is given, then do your duty as soldiers."

After these instructions, he dismissed the assembly, while throughout the army even the veterans admitted that they, like raw recruits, had for the first time learned how military matters should be handled.

A.U.C. 586

7 Non sermonibus tantum his cum quanto adsensu audissent verba consulis ostenderunt, sed rerum
8 praesens effectus erat. Neminem totis mox castris quietum videres: acuere alii gladios, alii galeas bucculasque, scuta alii loricasque [1] tergere, alii aptare corpori arma experirique sub his membrorum agilitatem, quatere alii pila, alii micare gladiis
9 mucronemque intueri, ut facile quis cerneret, ubi primum conserendi manum cum hoste data occasio esset, aut victoria egregia aut morte memorabili finituros [2] bellum.

10 Perseus quoque, cum adventu consulis simul et veris principio strepere omnia moverique apud hostes velut novo bello cerneret, mota a Phila castra in adversa ripa posita, nunc ad contemplanda opera sua circumire ducem haud dubie transitus speculantem, nunc [3] . . . . Romanorum [4] esse.

XXXV. Quae res Romanis auxit animos. Macedonibus regique eorum haud mediocrem attulit
2 terrorem. Et primo supprimere in occulto famam eius rei est conatus, missis, qui Pantauchum inde
3 venientem adpropinquare castris vetarent. Sed iam et pueri quidam visi ab suis erant inter obsides Illyrios

[1] bucculasque, scuta alii loricasque ed. Bas. 1535: buccolasque scutorũ alii loricas V.

[2] memorabili finituros Muretus: memorabilis inituros V.

[3] speculantem, nunc H. J. Müller: speculan V. Hic excidit folium unum.

[4] Romanorum Sigonius: norum V.

[1] The Romans relied chiefly on the thrust, cf. Vegetius I. 12.

[2] According to Plutarch, Aemilius xv, a period of startling inactivity on both sides ensued. The words with which the

Not only did they show by such remarks with how much approval they had heard the words of the consul, but there was also an immediate response in action. Soon you could have seen no one idle in the whole camp; some were sharpening swords, others were polishing helmets and cheek-pieces, still others shields and coats of mail; some were fitting their armour to their bodies and trying the nimbleness of their bodies under arms, others were brandishing spears, others fencing with their swords and inspecting the point[1]; so that anyone could easily see that as soon as an opportunity of joining battle with the enemy had been given, they would put an end to the war either by a glorious victory or by a death that would go down in history. B.C. 168

When Perseus, too, noticed that on the arrival of the consul and the beginning of spring everything in the enemy camp was full of noise and bustle as if the war were just beginning, that the camp had been shifted from Phila to the bank opposite the Macedonians, and the hostile commander was now going about to view Perseus' defences, no doubt because he was reconnoitring a passage, now . . .[2] . . . of the Romans was.

XXXV. This affair raised the spirits of the Romans. It also brought no little panic to the Macedonians and their king. At first he tried to hide the report of the event in secret, by sending men to forbid Pantauchus, who was coming from there, to approach the camp. But now some boys were seen by their relatives being led along with the Illyrian hostages text resumes may conclude an account of how the news of Gentius' defeat arrived in the two camps.

A.U.C. 586

ducti, et quo quaeque accuratius celantur,[1] eo facilius loquacitate regiorum ministrorum emanant. 4 Sub idem tempus Rhodii legati in castra venerunt cum isdem de pace mandatis, quae Romae ingentem iram patrum excitaverant.[2] Multo iniquioribus animis 5 a castrensi consilio auditi sunt. Itaque cum alii legatos in vincula coniciendos censerent,[3] alii praecipites sine responso agendos e castris,[4] pronuntiavit consul [5] post diem quintum decimum se responsum 6 daturum. Interim, ut appareret quantum pacificantium Rhodiorum auctoritas valuisset, consultare de ratione belli gerendi coepit. Placebat quibusdam et maxime minoribus [6] natu per Elpei ripam 7 munitionesque vim facere: confertis et uno agmine impetum [7] facientibus resistere Macedonas non posse, ex tot castellis aliquanto altioribus ac munitioribus, quae validis praesidiis insedissent, priore anno de- 8 iectos. Aliis placebat Octavium cum classe Thessalonicam petere et populatione maritumae orae distringere copias regias, ut altero ab tergo se ostendente bello circumactus ad interiorem partem regni tuendam nudare aliqua parte transitus Elpei cogeretur. Ipsi natura et operibus inexsuperabilis ripa 9 videbatur, et praeterquam quod tormenta ubique disposita essent, missilibus etiam melius et certiore

[1] celantur J. F. Gronovius: curatur V.
[2] excitaverant Novák: excitare V.
[3] alii legatos in vincula coniciendos censerent add. Vahlen: om. V.
[4] agendos e castris Harant: agē dos icastris V.
[5] consul add. Vahlen: om. V.
[6] minoribus Crévier: maioribus V.
[7] agmine impetum add. Vahlen: om. V.

and the more carefully the various details were concealed, the more easily they leaked out through the garrulity of the king's servants. B.C. 168

About the same time envoys from Rhodes came into camp with the same message about peace which had aroused great wrath in the senators at Rome. They received a much less favourable audience from the council in the camp. So while some advised that the envoys be thrown into chains, others that they be driven headlong out of camp without an answer, the consul announced that he would make a reply a fortnight later. Meanwhile, to make it clear how much influence the Rhodian peace-makers had succeeded in exerting, he began to hold consultations as to the plan of campaign. Some, especially the younger, wished to force a way through the bank of the Elpeüs and the fortifications; a solid formation, they said, attacking in single column would be irresistible to the Macedonians, who had the previous year been driven out of so many forts,[1] rather higher and better fortified and held with strong garrisons. Others advised that Octavius with his fleet should make for Thessalonica and by ravaging the coastal area create a diversion of the king's forces, so that on the appearance of another attack in his rear the king would be pulled about to guard the inner part of his kingdom and be compelled to open a crossing somewhere over the Elpeüs. The consul himself regarded the river-bank as impregnable by nature and by fortification and, besides the fact that artillery had been placed everywhere, he had heard that the enemy employed

[1] This is contrary to the picture given by Livy above, chs. iv–vii, and seems to be inserted to show that the speakers estimated the situation incorrectly.

a.u.c. 586

10 ictu hostis uti audierat. Alio spectabat mens tota ducis; dimissoque consilio Perrhaebos mercatores Coenum et Menophilum, notae iam sibi et fidei et [1] prudentiae homines, accersitos secreto percunctatur,
11 quales ad Perrhaebiam transitus sint. Cum loca non iniqua esse dicerent, praesidiis autem regiis [2] obsideri, spem cepit, si nocte improviso valida manu adgressus necopinantis esset, deici praesidia posse:
12 iacula enim et sagittas et cetera missilia in tenebris, ubi quid petatur procul provideri nequeat, inutilia esse; gladio comminus geri rem in permixta turba,
13 quo miles Romanus vincat. His ducibus usurus praetorem Octavium accersitum, exposito quid pararet Heracleum [3] cum classe petere iubet et mille hominibus decem dierum cocta [4] cibaria habere.
14 Ipse P. Scipionem Nasicam, Q. Fabium Maximum filium suum cum quinque milibus [5] delectis militum Heracleum mittit, velut classem conscensuros ad maritumam oram interioris Macedoniae, quod in 15 consilio agitatum erat, vastandam. Secreto indi-

[1] notae iam sibi et fidei et Kreyssig: notae et fidei iam sibi et V.
[2] regiis Crévier: regis V.
[3] Heracleum J. F. Gronovius: heraclium V.
[4] cocta Fr.: cognita V.
[5] milibus add. Hertz: om. V.

---

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xv and xvi. 1, says that the passes were not guarded at this time, but that Perseus sent a force after hearing that Romans, under Nasica, were on the march to Pythium. Plutarch cites Polybius and Nasica himself for the story of the dislodging of the Macedonians.

[2] As explained by Plutarch, Aemilius xv, this was the elder of Aemilius' sons by his first wife; the younger became Scipio Africanus the Younger, cf. below, xliv. 1–2. After divorcing his wife, remarrying, and having two more sons missile weapons better and with more deadly aim. B.C. 168

The whole thought of the Roman commander inclined in a different direction; and dismissing his council, he summoned the Perrhaebian merchants Coenus and Menophilus, men already known to him for loyalty and wisdom, and secretly inquired what the passes into Perrhaebia were like. When they said that the terrain was not difficult, but was blocked by the king's guard-forces,[1] the consul conceived the hope that the guards could be dislodged if he attacked suddenly by night with a strong force and surprised them; for, he argued, javelins, arrows, and other missiles are useless in the dark when the target cannot be sighted at a distance; the sword is the weapon used at close quarters in a confused throng, and with that weapon the Roman soldier would win. Planning to use the above-mentioned merchants as guides, the consul summoned the praetor Octavius, explained his plans, and ordered him to sail for Heracleum with the fleet and have ten days' cooked rations for a thousand men. For his own part, he sent Publius Scipio Nasica and his own son Quintus Fabius Maximus[2] with five thousand picked men[3] to Heracleum, in order to feign an embarkation for the purpose of the plan mentioned in the council, namely, of ravaging the coastal area of inner Macedonia. Scipio and Fabius were privately

(for whom see below, XLV. xl. 7), Aemilius gave the older pair in adoption. Fabius was about eighteen at this time; his adoption had taken place about ten years before.

[3] Plutarch, following Nasica and correcting Polybius, lists three thousand Italians ("special troops"—ἐκτὸς τάξεως = extraordinarii ?), five thousand of the "left wing" (= sinistra ala, i.e. cavalry ?), 120 cavalry, and 200 mixed Thracians and Cretans.

A.U.C. 586

catum cibaria his praeparata ad classem esse, ne quid eos moraretur. Inde iussi duces itineris ita dividere viam, ut quarta vigilia tertio die Pythoum adoriri 16 possent. Ipse postero die, ut detineret regem ab circumspectu rerum aliarum, prima luce medio in alveo cum stationibus hostium proelium commisit; pugnatumque utrimque est levi armatura. Nec gravioribus armis in tam inaequali alveo pugnari
17 poterat. Descensus ripae utriusque in alveum trecentorum ferme passuum erat; medium spatium torrentis alibi aliter cavati paulo plus quam mille
18 passus patebat. Ibi in medio spectantibus utrimque ex vallo castrorum hinc rege,[1] hinc consule cum suis
19 legionibus pugnatum est. Missilibus procul regia auxilia melius pugnabant; comminus stabilior et tutior aut parma aut scuto Ligustico Romanus erat.
20 Meridie fere receptui cani suis consul iussit. Ita eo die diremptum proelium est haud paucis utrimque
21 interfectis. Sole orto postero die irritatis certamine animis etiam acrius concursum est. Sed Romani non ab iis[2] tantum, cum quibus contractum certamen erat, sed multo magis ab ea multitudine quae disposita in turribus stabat omni genere missilium telorum ac
22 saxis maxime volnerabantur. Ubi propius ripam hostium subissent, tormentis missa etiam ad ultimos perveniebant. Multo pluribus eo die[3] amissis 23 consul paulo serius recepit suos. Tertio die proelio

[1] hinc rege add. Fr.: om. V.
[2] iis Kreyssig: his V.
[3] pluribus eo die Fr.: plurimos eo dicto V.

[1] This is based on Polybius XXIX. 14. 4; the Ligurian shield was long and light, according to Diodorus V. 39. 7.

informed that food was ready for them at the fleet, B.C. 168 so that they would not be delayed. Next, the guides were instructed to arrange the stages of the journey so that they could attack Pythoüs in the fourth watch of the third day. Next day at dawn the consul himself, in order to keep the king from investigating the other projects, joined battle with the enemy's outposts in the middle of the river-bed. The fight was conducted with light-armed troops on both sides. It was impossible to fight with heavier troops in so rough a stream-bed. The slope of either bank to the bottom was about three hundred paces; between the banks, a space of a little over a mile lay open where the torrent had hollowed it out in varying degrees from place to place. There the fight took place in sight of the watchers from the walls of both camps, the king on one side, the consul and his legions on the other. The king's light troops fought better at long range with missiles; at close quarters the Romans were steadier, and better protected by either the cavalry targe or the Ligurian rectangular shield.[1] About noon the consul ordered the recall to be sounded for his men. So that day the fight was broken off with no small losses to both sides. At sunrise the next day an even sharper fight took place, since their spirits had been roused by the combat. But the Romans received a great many wounds not only from those with whom the fight had been joined, but much more from the large numbers posted on the towers with all sorts of missile weapons and stones. As they came nearer to the enemy's bank, the shots from the engines reached even the rear ranks. After far more severe losses that day, the consul recalled his men somewhat later. On the v.c. 586 abstinuit, degressus[1] ad imam partem castrorum, veluti per devexum in mare bracchium transitum 24 temptaturus. Perseus, quod in oculis erat . . . .

XXXVI. Tempus[2] anni post circumactum solstitium erat; hora diei iam ad meridiem vergebat; iter multo pulvere et incalescente sole factum erat.
2 Lassitudo et sitis iam sentiebatur et meridiem aestum magis accensurum cum mox appareret,[3] statuit sic adfectos recenti atque integro hosti non
3 obicere; sed tantus ardor in animis ad dimicandum utcumque erat, ut consuli non minore arte ad suos
4 eludendos quam ad hostes opus esset. Nondum omnibus instructis instabat tribunis militum, ut maturarent instruere: circumibat ipse ordines; ani-
5 mos militum hortando in pugnam accendebat. Ibi primo alacres signum poscebant; deinde, quantum increscceret aestus,[4] et voltus minus vigentes et voces segniores erant, et quidam incumbentes scutis nixique
6 pilis stabant. Tum iam aperte primis ordinibus imperat, metarentur frontem castrorum et impedi-
7 menta constituerent. Quod ubi fieri milites sensere, alii gaudere palam quod fessos viae labore flagrantis-8 simo aestu non coegisset pugnare; legati circa

[1] degressus J. F. Gronovius: digressus V.

[2] Exciderunt iv folia; tempus add. Sigonius: om. V.

[3] et meridiem aestum magis accensurum cum mox appareret Gitlbauer: et meridie aestatemagis accesserunt tum mox adparebat V.

[4] increscceret aestus ed. Bas. 1535: increscere aestaset V.

[1] Judging from Plutarch, Aemilius xvi, the lost four sheets told of the success of Nasica in clearing the pass, Perseus' fright and retreat, and his subsequent resolve to make a stand at Pydna; also of the joining of Nasica with Paulus and the overtaking of the Macedonians.

third day, he desisted from battle and went down to B.C. 168 the lower side of the camp as if he were going to attempt the crossing through the spur of the fortifications which ran down to the sea. What was before Perseus' eyes . . .[1]

XXXVI. The season was that immediately following the turn of midsummer[2]; the time of day was approaching noon; the journey had been made through much dust and an ever-hotter sun. Weariness and thirst now began to make themselves felt, and since it was presently obvious that midday would intensify the blazing heat, the consul decided not to expose men so weakened to a fresh and unwearied enemy; but such zeal was in their hearts for fighting at all costs that the consul needed as much skill to outmanoeuvre his own men as the enemy. Since all were not yet in formation, he urged on the tribunes of the soldiers to hasten the deployment; he himself went about the ranks and was engaged in rousing the spirits of the men to battle by exhortation. At this they first kept eagerly calling for the signal; then, in proportion as the heat increased their countenances were less lively and their cries slacker, and some stood lolling on their shields and leaning on their spears. Then the consul proceeded openly to give the order to the ranking centurions to lay out the front of the camp and place the baggage.[3] When the soldiers perceived that this was being done, some rejoiced openly that he had not compelled men wearied by the toil of marching to fight a battle in scorching heat. Surrounding the general were his

[2] See below, xxxvii. 5–8 and note 1; by the then calendar, it was Sept. 3.

[3] Which was placed next the wall of the camp.

A.U.C. 586

imperatorem ducesque externi erant, inter quos et Attalus, omnes approbantes, dum pugnaturum consulem credebant—neque enim ne his quidem[1] 9 cunctationem aperuerat suam—; tunc mutatione consilii subita cum alii silerent, Nasica unus ex omnibus ausus est monere consulem ne hostem ludificatum[2] priores imperatores fugiendo certamen mani- 10 bus emitteret[3]: vereri ne, si[4] nocte abeat, sequendus maximo labore ac periculo in intima Macedoniae sit, aestasque,[5] sicut prioribus ducibus, per calles saltusque Macedonicorum montium vagando circumagatur. 11 Se magnopere suadere, dum in campo patenti hostem habeat, adgrediatur, nec oblatam occasionem vincendi 12 amittat. Consul nihil offensus libera admonitione tam clari adulescentis:

"Et ego" inquit "animum istum habui, Nasica, quem tu nunc habes, et quem ego nunc habeo, tu 13 habebis. Multis belli casibus didici, quando pugnandum, quando abstinendum pugna sit. Non operae sit stanti nunc in acie docere, quibus de causis hodie quiesse melius sit. Rationes alias reposcito; nunc auctoritate veteris imperatoris contentus eris." 14 Conticuit adulescens: haud dubie videre aliqua impedimenta pugnae consulem, quae sibi non apparerent.

XXXVII. Paulus postquam metata castra impedimentaque conlocata animadvertit, ex postrema acie

[1] quidem add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[2] ne hostem ludificatum Crévier: ne hostem quidem ludificatus V.
[3] emitteret J. F. Gronovius: emittere V.
[4] si add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[5] aestasque Madvig: aesosque V.

[1] As far as Livy's account goes, this applies only to Marcius, above, vi–x.

staff and the foreign commanders, among whom was B.C. 168
Attalus, all showing approval as long as they believed the consul was going to fight (for he had not revealed his doubts even to them); then at the sudden change of plan they were all silent except Nasica, who alone dared to advise the consul not to loose his grasp on an enemy who had baffled previous generals by avoiding an encounter. Nasica feared that if the enemy departed by night, he would have to be pursued with the greatest toil and risk into the interior of Macedonia, and that the summer would be wasted, as under previous leaders,[1] in roaming about the bypaths and passes of the Macedonian mountains; for his own part he strongly urged attack while the consul had the enemy in open country, so as not to lose the opportunity for victory which had been offered. The consul, nothing offended by the outspoken warning from so famous a young man, replied:

"I too have had the spirit which you now have, Nasica, and you will come to have the spirit I now have. From many vicissitudes of war I have learned when to fight and when to refuse battle. There is not time to instruct you while you are standing-to for battle as to the reasons why it is better to be inactive today. You shall ask for my reasoning at another time; now you will be satisfied to take the word of an experienced general."

The young man held his tongue, thinking that no doubt the consul saw some obstacles to battle which he himself did not envisage.

XXXVII. After Paulus saw that the camp had been laid out and the baggage placed, he quietly withdrew the rear formation first from behind the triarios primos subducit, deinde principes, stantibus in prima acie hastatis, si quid hostis moveret, postremo hastatos, ab dextro primum cornu singulorum paulatim signorum milites subtrahens. Ita pedites equitibus cum levi armatura ante aciem hosti oppositis sine tumultu abducti, nec ante quam prima frons valli ac fossa perducta est, ex statione equites revocati sunt. Rex quoque, cum sine detractatione paratus pugnare eo die fuisset, contentus eo quod [1] per hostem moram fuisse scirent, et ipse in castra copias reduxit. Castris permunitis C. Sulpicius Gallus, tribunus militum secundae legionis, qui praetor superiore anno fuerat, consulis permissu ad contionem militibus vocatis pronuntiavit, nocte proxima, ne quis id pro portento acciperet, ab hora secunda usque ad quartam horam noctis lunam defecturam esse. Id quia naturali ordine statis temporibus fiat, et sciri ante et praedici posse. Itaque quem ad modum, quia certi solis lunaeque et ortus et occasus sint, nunc pleno orbe, nunc senescentem [2] exiguo cornu fulgere [3] lunam non mirarentur, ita ne obscurari quidem, cum condatur

A.U.C. 586

[1] eo quod Hertz: equod V.
[2] senescentem Florebellus: senescente V.
[3] fulgere ed. Bas. 1535: fugere V.

---

[1] He is mentioned by Cicero, De Senectute xiv. 49 as a geometer and astronomer. For his praetorship, see XLIII. ii. 5. Pliny, Nat. Hist. II. xii. 53, Frontinus I. xii. 8, and Zonaras 9. 23 speak of a prediction by Sulpicius; Justinus 33. 1. 7, Cicero, De Republica I. xv. 23, Valerius Maximus 8. 11. 1, and Plutarch, Aemilius xvii say that the explanation followed the eclipse. A fragment of Polybius XXIX. 16 (6) states that the eclipse was interpreted as portending the fall of a king; therefore it cheered the Romans and discouraged the Macedonians, see below, sec. 9. Modern reckoning sets the battle-line, next the chief formation, while the forward B.C. 168 formation stood its ground at the front of the battle-line, in case the enemy should make a move; last of all he withdrew the forward formation, taking the soldiers of one maniple at a time, starting with the right wing. In this way, while the cavalry and the light-armed troops faced the enemy from in front of the battle-line. the infantry were withdrawn without confusion, and the cavalry were not called away from their posts until the façade of the rampart and the ditch facing the enemy had been completed. Although the king would have been prepared to fight that day without reluctance, he was satisfied to let it be seen that the delay was due to the enemy, and he too withdrew his forces into camp.

After the fortification of the camp was complete, Gaius Sulpicius Gallus,[1] tribune of the soldiers with the second legion, who had been praetor the year before, summoned the soldiers to an assembly, by permission of the consul, and announced that no one should regard it as a bad omen when on the following night an eclipse of the moon would take place from the second to the fourth hour of the night. Since this occurred in the regular order of nature at certain times, said Sulpicius, it could be calculated ahead of time and foretold. Therefore just as they were not surprised—inasmuch as both the risings and the settings of the sun and moon are well understood—when they saw the moon shining now full, now during its wane with a narrow arc, no more ought they to count it a prodigy that the moon is darkened date of the eclipse as June 21, which would mean that the calendar was at least 70 days ahead of time, cf. p. 87, Appendix.

A.U.C. 586

8 umbra terrae, trahere in prodigium debere. Nocte quam pridie nonas Septembres insecuta est dies, edita hora luna cum defecisset, Romanis militibus Galli
9 sapientia prope divina videri; Macedonas ut triste prodigium, occasum regni perniciemque gentis portendens, movit nec aliter vates. Clamor ululatusque in castris Macedonum fuit, donec luna in suam lucem emersit.
10 Postero die—tantus utrique ardor exercitui ad concurrendum fuerat, ut et regem et consulem suorum quidam, quod sine proelio discessum esset, accusarent
11 —regi prompta defensio erat, non eo solum quod hostis prior aperte pugnam detractans in castra copias reduxisset, sed etiam quod eo loco signa constituisset, quo phalanx, quam inutilem vel mediocris iniquitas
12 loci efficeret, promoveri non posset. Consul ad id quod pridie praetermisisse pugnandi occasionem videbatur et locum dedisse hosti, si nocte abire vellet, tunc quoque per speciem immolandi terere videbatur tempus, cum luce prima ad signum propositum pugnae 13 exeundum [1] in aciem fuisset. Tertia demum hora sacrificio rite perpetrato ad consilium vocavit; atque ibi quod rei gerendae tempus esset loquendo et intempestive consultando videbatur quibusdam extrahere. Adversus eos sermones talem [2] consul orationem habuit.

XXXVIII. "P. Nasica, egregius adulescens, ex

[1] exeundum Fahlen: ad exeundum V.
[2] adversus eos sermones talem Madvig: sermones tamen V.

---

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xvii. 6, says that the consul's sacrifice to Heracles obtained good omens only with the twenty-first whenever it is hidden in the shadow of the earth. B.C. 168

On the night preceding the 4th of September, when the moon was eclipsed at the predicted hour, the Roman soldiers regarded the wisdom of Gallus as almost divine: the Macedonians took it as a dire portent, foretelling the downfall of the kingdom and the nation, and no soothsayer shook their conviction. There was uproar and wailing in the Macedonian camp until the moon emerged to shine as usual.

On the following day, so great was the eagerness of both armies for battle that some of their followers blamed both the king and the consul for separating without a fight. The king had a rejoinder ready at hand: not only that the enemy had taken the lead in openly declining battle and leading his men back to camp, but that he had posted his forces in a position to which the phalanx could not be advanced, since even slightly unfavourable terrain makes a phalanx useless. As for the consul, besides his seeming loss of an opportunity for battle on the previous day and his giving the enemy a chance of withdrawing by night if they wished, he seemed on this day too to be wasting time on the pretext of offering sacrifice, although he should have given the signal at dawn and gone out to battle.[1] At the third hour, after due completion of the sacrifice, he at last called a council, and in doing so seemed to some to be expending in talk and untimely advisement the time needed for carrying out action. In reply to such talk the consul delivered the following speech:

XXXVIII. "That excellent young man, Publius victim; also that the consul waited till the afternoon so that the sun would not be in the eyes of his troops.

u.c. 556

omnibus [1] unus, quibus hesterno die pugnari placuit, denudavit mihi suum consilium; idem postea, ita ut transisse in sententiam meam videri posset, tacuit. 2 Quibusdam aliis absentem carpere imperatorem quam 3 praesentem monere melius visum est. Et tibi, P. Nasica, et quicumque idem quod tu [2] occultius senserunt, non gravabor reddere dilatae pugnae rationem. 4 Nam tantum abest ut me hesternae quietis paeniteat, ut servatum a me exercitum eo consilio credam. In qua me opinione sine causa esse ne quis [3] vestrum credat, recognoscat agedum mecum, si videtur, quam 5 multa pro hoste et adversus nos fuerint. Iam omnium primum, quantum numero nos praestent neminem vestrum nec ante ignorasse et hesterno die explicatam [4] intuentis aciem animadvertisse certum habeo. 6 Ex hac nostra paucitate quarta pars militum praesidio impedimentis relicta erat; nec ignavissimum quem- 7 que relinqui ad custodiam sarcinarum scitis. Sed fuerimus omnes: parvum hoc tandem esse credimus, quod ex his castris, in quibus hac nocte mansimus, exituri in aciem hodierno aut summum crastino die, 8 si ita videbitur, diis bene iuvantibus sumus? nihilne interest, utrum militem, quem neque viae labor eo die [5] neque operis fatigaverit, requietum, integrum in tentorio suo arma capere iubeas atque in aciem plenum virium, vigentem et corpore et animo educas,

[1] ex omnibus ed. Amstelod. 1633: omnibus ex V.
[2] tu add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] sine causa esse ne quis Vahlen: esse ne quis sine causa V.
[4] explicatam J. F. Gronovius: inplicatam V.
[5] labor eo die Vahlen: labore hodie V.

Nasica, alone among all those who favoured fighting yesterday disclosed his opinion to me; he too kept silent later, so that he may have seemed to have exchanged his view for mine. Certain others thought it better to criticize their general behind his back rather than to advise him openly. Both to you, Publius Nasica, and to any others who less openly shared your opinion, I shall not hesitate to give an accounting for having postponed the battle. For I am so far from regretting our inactivity yesterday that I believe I saved the army by so planning. That none of you may believe me to hold this opinion groundlessly, come let each, if he please, review with me how many factors weighed for the enemy and against us. First of all, of their great superiority in numbers I am sure that you were all previously aware, and that you took notice of it on seeing the battle-line drawn up yesterday. Out of this small force of ours, one-fourth of the men were left to guard the baggage; and you know that the guarding of the packs is not put in the hands of the most cowardly. But suppose we had been united: can we possibly consider it a small advantage that we shall go out, with the good help of the gods,[1] from this camp in which we have spent last night, to do battle either today or at latest tomorrow if we so determine? Does it make no difference whether you bid a soldier take up arms and lead him into battle when he is wearied neither by the toil of a journey nor by construction on that day, when he is rested and refreshed in his own tent, when he is full of strength and vigorous in body and in spirit? Or whether he B.C. 168

[1] For similar expressions of precautionary piety, see VI. xxiii. 10, VII. xxxii. 17, XXI. xxi. 6.

9 an longo itinere fatigatum et onere fessum, madentem sudore, arentibus[1] siti faucibus, ore atque oculis repletis pulvere, torrente[2] meridiano sole, hosti obicias recenti, requieto,[3] qui nulla re ante consumptas
10 vires ad proelium adferat? quis, pro deum fidem, ita comparatus, vel iners atque imbellis, fortissimum virum non[4] vicerit?
11 Quid, quod hostes per summum otium instruxerant aciem, praeparaverant animos, stabant, compositi suis quisque ordinibus, nobis tunc repente trepidandum in acie instruenda erat et incompositis concurrendum? XXXIX. At hercule aciem quidem inconditam inordinatamque habuissemus, sed[5] castra munita, provisam aquationem, tutum ad eam iter praesidiis impositis, explorata circa omnia; an nihil nostri[6] habentes praeter nudum campum, in quo
2 pugnaremus . . . .[7] Maiores vestri castra munita portum ad omnis casus exercitus ducebant esse, unde ad pugnam exirent, quo iactati tempestate pugnae
3 receptum haberent. Ideo, cum munimentis ea saepsissent,[8] praesidio quoque valido firmabant, quod, qui castris exutus erat, etiamsi pugnando acie vicisset, pro victo haberetur. Castra sunt victori receptaculum, victo perfugium. Quam multi exercitus,
4 quibus minus prospera pugnae fortuna fuit, intra vallum compulsi tempore suo, interdum momento post, eruptione facta victorem hostem pepulerunt?

[1] arentibus Florebellus: ardentibus V.
[2] torrente I. Perizonius: torrentem V.
[3] requieto J. F. Gronovius: quieto V.
[4] non add. Fr.: om. V.
[5] sed add. Madvig: om. V.
[6] nostri Cobet: vestri V.
[7] lacunam suspiciunt edd.; Giarratano: "supple: sine ullo consilio cum hoste dimicassemus? vel aliquid simile."
[8] ea saepsissent J. F. Gronovius: eas saepissent V.

is wearied by a long march and tired by his load, B.C. 168 dripping with sweat, his throat dry with thirst, his mouth and eyes full of dust, with the midday sun beating down upon him? Will you pit him against an enemy fresh and rested, who brings into battle a strength unsapped by previous exertion? Who, by the gods' good faith, when he is thus matched, sluggish though he be and unwarlike, will not overcome the bravest fighter?

"What of the fact that the enemy had drawn up their line completely at leisure, had made ready their spirits, were standing each at his post in the ranks, while we at that time had to incur the hasty turmoil of drawing up our line and had to enter battle in disorder? XXXIX. Oh yes, you say, we should have had a battle-line undeployed and disorderly; but our camp was fortified, our water-supply found, the way to it secured by placing guards, and reconnaissance made all around. Or did our men have nothing but the bare ground on which to fight . . . ? Your ancestors regarded a fortified camp as a haven against all the mischances of an army, whence they might go out to fight, and whither they might find shelter from the storm of battle. Therefore when they had walled in their camp with fortifications, they used also to strengthen it with a powerful garrison, because one who had been stripped of his camp, even though he had won the battle, would be considered the loser. Camp is the shelter of the conqueror, the refuge of the conquered. How many armies meeting with none too favourable fortune in battle, after being driven within their rampart, have in their own good time, sometimes after only a moment, sallied forth and routed the victorious enemy? This abode is a second

U.C. 586

5 Patria altera militaris est haec [1] sedes, vallumque pro moenibus et tentorium suum cuique militi domus ac penates sunt. Sine ulla sede vagi dimicassemus, ut quo victi, quo [2] victores nos reciperemus?

6 His difficultatibus et impedimentis pugnae illud opponitur: quid, si hostis hac interposita nocte abisset, quantum rursus sequendo eo penitus in ulti-
7 mam Macedoniam exhauriendum laboris erat? Ego autem neque mansurum eum neque in aciem copias educturum fuisse certum habeo, si cedere hinc statuisset. Quanto enim facilius abire fuit cum procul abessemus, quam nunc cum in cervicibus sumus, nec fallere
8 nos interdiu aut nocte abeundo potest? quid autem est [3] nobis optatius quam ut, quorum castra praealta fluminis ripa tuta, vallo insuper saepta ac [4] crebris turribus oppugnare adorti sumus, eos relictis munimentis, agmine effuso abeuntis in patentibus campis ab tergo adoriamur?

Hae dilatae pugnae ex hesterno die in hodiernum
9 causae fuerunt. Pugnare enim et ipsi mihi placet; et ideo, quia per Elpeum amnem saepta ad hostem via erat, alio saltu deiectis hostium praesidiis novum iter aperui, neque prius, quam debellavero, absistam."

XL. Post hanc orationem silentium fuit, partim traductis in sententiam eius, partim verentibus nequiquam offendere in eo, quod utcumque praeter-
2 missum revocari non posset. Ac ne illo ipso quidem

[1] Patria altera militaris est haec Wesenberg: patriam alteram est militari est haec V.

[2] victi, quo add. H. J. Müller: om. V.

[3] nos interdiu aut nocte abeundo potest? quid autem est Madvig: nos nec interdiu aut nocte abeundtem est V.

[4] ac add. Fr.: om. V.

home for the soldier, its rampart takes the place of B.C. 168 city walls and his own tent is the soldier's dwelling and hearthside. Should we have fought like nomads with no abode, so that, whether conquered or conquerors, we might return—where?

"To this statement of the difficulties and hindrances to battle, here is the rejoinder: what if the enemy had departed during the interval of last night? How much toil would we have had to expend in the renewed pursuit far into the utmost end of Macedonia? For my part I am sure that he would never have remained here or led his forces out into battle-line had he decided to retreat from here. For how much easier it would have been to depart while we were at a distance than now when we are on his neck and he cannot trick us by leaving either by night or day? What more can we wish than to attack our enemy in open country from the rear of his retreating and dispersed column after he has left his fortifications, instead of attacking, as we have attempted to do, his camp protected by the lofty bank of a river, and barricaded as well with a rampart and plenty of towers?

"These were my reasons for postponing battle from yesterday to today. For I too prefer to fight; and therefore since the way to the enemy was barred by the Elpeüs River, I have opened a new road by expelling the enemy's guards from a different pass, and I will not turn back till I have fought to a finish."

XL. After this speech silence ensued, partly because men had changed over to his opinion, partly because they shrank from offending him to no purpose in a matter which was in any case a lost opportunity and could not be brought back. Nor die aut consuli aut regi pugnare placebat, regi,[1] quod nec fessos, ut pridie, ex via neque trepidantis in acie instruenda et vixdum compositos adgressurus erat, consuli, quod in novis castris non ligna, non pabulum convectum erat, ad quae petenda ex propinquis agris magna pars militum e castris exierat. Neutro imperatorum volente fortuna, quae plus consiliis humanis pollet, contraxit certamen. Flumen erat haud magnum propius hostium castra,[2] ex quo et Macedones et Romani aquabantur praesidiis ex utraque ripa positis, ut id facere tuto possent. Duae cohortes a parte Romanorum erant, Marrucina et Paeligna, duae turmae Samnitium equitum, quibus praerat M. Sergius Silus legatus; et aliud pro castris stativum erat praesidium sub C. Cluvio legato, tres cohortes, Firmana, Vestina, Cremonensis, duae turmae equitum, Placentina et Aesernina.[3] Cum otium ad flumen esset neutris lacessentibus, hora circiter nona[4] iumentum e manibus curantium elapsum in ulteriorem ripam effugit. Quod cum per aquam ferme genus[5] tenus altam tres miltes sequerentur, Thraces duo id iumentum ex medio alveo in suam ripam trahentes caperent, hos persecuti illi[6] altero eorum occiso receptoque[7] iumento ad stationem

A.U.C. 586

[1] pugnare placebat, regi add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[2] castra J. F. Gronovius: castris V.
[3] Placentina et Aesernina Sigonius: placentis naeptesserninа V.
[4] nona J. F. Gronovius: quarta V.
[5] sic V: genibus Novák.
[6] caperent, hos persecuti illi add. M. Müller: om. V.
[7] receptoque A. Perizonius: receptoque eo V.

even on that day did either the consul or the king B.C. 168 care to fight, the king because he would have had to attack men no longer weary from travel as on the previous day, nor in turmoil as they marshalled their line of battle and hardly in formation, the consul because neither wood nor fodder had been collected in the new camp and a large number of soldiers had gone out of camp to seek them from the near-by countryside. Without either general wishing it, Fortune, which is stronger than human planning, brought on the battle. There was a stream of no great size nearer the camp of the enemy, from which both the Macedonians and the Romans were drawing water after posting guards on either bank in order to accomplish this mission safely. There were two cohorts on the Roman side, a Marrucinian and a Paelignian, and two troops of Samnite cavalry under the command of the staff-officer Marcus Sergius Silus; another fixed outpost was stationed before the camp under the staff-officer Gaius Cluvius, composed of three cohorts, from Firmum, the Vestini, and Cremona respectively, and two troops of cavalry from Placentia and Aesernia.[1] While there was quiet at the river, since neither side took the offensive, about the ninth hour a baggage-animal shied from the hands of his grooms and escaped toward the other bank.[2] While three soldiers were chasing him through the water, which was about knee-deep, two Thracians dragged the animal from mid-stream to their bank; the Romans pursued them, killed one,

[1] The Marrucini, Paeligni, Samnites, and Vestini were Italian "allies" of the Romans; Firmum, Cremona, Placentia, and Aesernia were colonies with Latin rights.

[2] Plutarch credits Aemilius with ordering a horse to be let loose, in order to bring on the battle.

A.U.C. 586

suorum se[1] recipiebant. Octingentorum Thracum praesidium in hostium ripa erat. Ex his pauci primo, aegre passi popularem in suo conspectu caesum, ad persequendos interfectores fluvium transgressi sunt, dein plures, postremo omnes, et cum praesidio . . .[2]

XLI. . . .[3] proelium ducit. Movebat imperii maiestas, gloria viri, ante omnia aetas, quod maior sexaginta annis iuvenum munia in parte praecipua laboris periculique capessebat. Intervallum, quod inter caetratos et phalanges erat, implevit legio atque aciem hostium interrupit. A tergo caetrati erant,[4] frontem adversus clupeatos habebat; chalcaspides[5] appellabantur. Secundam legionem L. Albinus consularis ducere adversus leucaspidem phalangem iussus; ea media acies hostium fuit. In dextrum cornu, unde circa fluvium commissum proelium erat, elephantos inducit et alas[6] sociorum; et hinc primum fuga Macedonum est orta. Nam sicut pleraque nova commenta mortalium in verbis vim habent, experiendo,[7] cum agi non quem ad modum agatur[8] edisseri oportet, sine ullo effectu evanescunt, ita tum

[1] se add. Fr.: om. V.
[2] Exciderunt duo folia.
[3] Ibi finitur folium; lacunam ind. ed. Bas. 1531.
[4] caetrati erant Madvig: cetratis erant V.
[5] chalcaspides J. F. Gronovius: caclaspides V.
[6] elephantos inducit et alas Kreyssig: elepantos induciet alias V.
[7] experiendo Turnebus: expiēdo V.
[8] agatur Sigonius: agātur V.

[1] Two leaves of the MS. are missing at this point. Judging from Plutarch, these pages contained a description of the advance of the armies from camp, their battle-order, skir-recaptured the animal, and retired to their post. B.C. 168

There was a guard of eight hundred Thracians on the Macedonian bank. At first a few of these, angry at the killing of their fellow-countryman before their eyes, crossed the river in pursuit of the killers, then more went, and finally the whole force, and with the guard . . .[1]

XLI. . . . led . . . the battle. The men were stirred by the prestige of his office, the fame of the man, and above all by his age, for though he was over sixty he kept assuming functions of men in their prime in undergoing an outstanding amount of toil and danger. The legion filled the space between the light infantry and the phalanxes and broke the enemy line. In the rear were the light infantry; the consul faced a unit with metal shields—these were called the Bronze Shields. Lucius Albinus the ex-consul was ordered to advance against the White Shield phalanx[2]; this was the centre of the hostile line. On the right wing, where the battle had begun near the river, the consul brought up the elephants and the squadrons of the allies; and from this point the flight of the Macedonians first began. For, as frequently men's new inventions appear strong when described, but in actual trial, when there is need for action rather than a description of how they will act, these inventions disappear without achieving any result, so in this battle the anti-elephant corps was mishing by the light-armed troops in which the Macedonians had the advantage, the charge of the Paelignians against some Macedonian light infantry and their collision with the phalanx (cf. below, sec. 9), and perhaps the impression made on Aemilius by the phalanx, an impression which he was careful not to show at the time.

[2] Plutarch speaks of this unit as having gilded armour.

A.U.C. 586

elephantomachae [1] nomen tantum sine usu fuerunt. 5 Elephantorum impetum subsecuti sunt socii nominis 6 Latini pepuleruntque laevum cornu. In medio secunda legio immissa dissipavit phalangem. Neque ulla evidentior causa victoriae fuit, quam quod multa passim proelia erant, quae fluctuantem turbarunt primo, deinde disiecerunt phalangem, cuius confertae et intentis horrentis hastis intolerabiles vires sunt; 7 si carptim adgrediendo circumagere immobilem longitudine et gravitate hastam cogas, confusa strue implicantur; si vero aut ab latere aut ab tergo aliquid 8 tumultus increpuit, ruinae modo turbantur, sicut tum adversus catervatim incurrentes Romanos et interrupta multifariam acie obviam ire cogebantur; et Romani, quacumque data intervalla essent, insi- 9 nuabant ordines suos. Qui si universa acie in frontem adversus instructam phalangem concurrissent, quod Paelignis principio pugnae incaute congressis adversus caetratos evenit, induissent se hastis nec confertam aciem sustinuissent.

XLII. Ceterum sicut peditum passim caedes fiebant, nisi qui abiectis armis fugerunt, sic equitatus

[1] elephantomachae Hartel: elephanto mace V.

[1] Zonaras 9, 22 (p. 269) says that these were infantry with sharp spikes projecting from their helmets and shields, and also cavalry, both forces having been drilled to fight elephants; dummy elephants were used to accustom the horses to them. The words of Livy at the beginning of sec. 4 seem to be a direct quotation from Polybius XXIX. 17. 2 (12).

[2] A variant account of the battle is given by Frontinus II. iii. 20, who says that Paulus arranged his line in wedges, and tried to draw out the Macedonians by attacking with skirmishers (velites); when this failed, Paulus retreated, to induce the Macedonians to break formation; when this also a mere name without practical effect.[1] The charge of the elephants was followed up by the allies of the Latin Name, who routed the left wing. In the centre the charge of the second legion scattered the phalanx. No reason for the victory was more obvious than the fact that there were many scattered engagements which first threw into confusion and then disrupted the wavering phalanx. The power of this formation when closed up and bristling with spears extended is irresistible; but if by attacks at several points you compel them to swing their spears about, unwieldy because of their length and weight, they become tangled in a haphazard mass; and if indeed some sort of uproar is heard on a flank or from the rear, they are involved in utter confusion. Such was the case on this occasion, when the phalanx was compelled to meet the Romans who were attacking in groups, while the Macedonian line was broken at many points. The Romans for their part kept infiltrating their units wherever gaps presented themselves. If they had attacked frontally in solid line against an orderly phalanx, as happened to the Paelignians who at the beginning of the battle recklessly met the light infantry, the Romans would have spitted themselves on the spears and would not have withstood the solid line.[2] B.C. 168

XLII. However, while the infantry were being slaughtered all over the field, except for those who cast away their weapons and fled, the cavalry on the failed, the Roman cavalry from the left wing were ordered to charge along the front of the phalanx and break off the spear-points with their shields; when this manoeuvre succeeded, the Macedonians broke and fled. Livy seems to have a far preferable account.

A.U.C. 586

2 prope integer pugna excessit. Princeps fugae rex ipse erat. Iam a Pydna cum sacris alis equitum Pellam petebat; confestim eos Cotys[1] sequebatur
3 Odrysarumque equitatus. Ceterae quoque Macedonum alae integris abibant ordinibus, quia interiecta peditum acies, cuius caedes victores tenebat,[2]
4 immemores fecerat sequendi equites. Diu phalanx a fronte, a lateribus, ab tergo caesa est. Postremo qui ex hostium manibus elapsi erant, inermes ad mare fugientes, quidam aquam etiam ingressi, manus ad eos qui in classe erant tendentes, suppliciter
5 vitam orabant; et cum scaphas concurrere undique ab navibus cernerent, ad excipiendos sese venire rati, ut caperent potius quam occiderent, longius in aquam,
6 quidam etiam natantes, progressi sunt. Sed cum hostiliter e[3] scaphis caederentur retro qui poterant nando repetentes terram in aliam foediorem pestem incidebant: elephanti enim ab rectoribus ad litus acti exeuntis obterebant elidebantque.
7 Facile convenit ab Romanis[4] numquam una acie tantum Macedonum interfectum. Caesa enim ad viginti milia hominum sunt; ad sex milia,[5] qui Pydnam ex acie perfugerant, vivi in potestatem pervenerunt, et vagi ex fuga quinque milia[6] hominum capta.
8 Ex victoribus ceciderunt non plus centum, et eorum multo maior pars Paeligni; volnerati aliquanto plures
9 sunt. Quod si maturius pugnari coeptum esset, ut

[1] confestim eos Cotys Jac. Gronovius: confestī costocus V.
[2] tenebat J. F. Gronovius: tenebant V.
[3] e add. Fr.: om. V.
[4] convenit ab Romanis Weissenborn: conueniebat romanis V.
[5] milia add. Fr.: om. V.
[6] ex fuga quinque milia Kreyssig: et fuga ū m V.

other hand retired from the fight almost unscathed. B.C. 168
The king himself was the leader in the flight. Directly from Pydna he set out for Pella with the Sacred Squadrons of cavalry; immediately Cotys and the Odrysan cavalry followed them. The other Macedonian squadrons also continued to retreat in orderly formation because the line of the infantry in between kept the victors busy with slaughter and caused them to forget the pursuit of the cavalry. For a long time the phalanx was cut to pieces from the front, from the flanks, and from the rear. Finally those who slipped through the hands of the Romans fled weaponless to the sea, and some even entered the water and raising their hands to the men on board ship humbly begged for life. When they saw small boats gathering from all around the fleet, they thought that these were coming to pick them up, to take them prisoner rather than to kill them, and so they advanced farther into the water, some even swimming. But when they were mercilessly cut down from the boats, those who could made for shore again by swimming and ran into a more dreadful form of destruction; for the elephants, guided by their mahouts to the shore, trampled and crushed the men coming out of the water.

It is readily agreed that the Romans never killed so many Macedonians in any other single battle. For about twenty thousand men were slain; about six thousand who escaped from the battlefield to Pydna were taken alive, and five thousand stragglers were captured in flight. Of the victors not more than one hundred fell and by far the greater part of them were Paeligni; somewhat more were wounded. If fighting had broken out earlier, so that sufficient satis diei victoribus ad persequendum superesset, deletae omnes copiae forent: nunc imminens nox et fugientes texit et Romanis pigritiem ad sequendum locis ignotis fecit.

A.U.C. 586

XLIII. Perseus ad Pieriam silvam via militari frequenti agmine equitum et regio comitatu fugit. Simul in silvam [1] ventum est, ubi plures diversae semitae erant, et nox adpropinquabat, cum perpaucis maxime fidis via devertit. Equites sine duce relicti alii alia in civitates suas dilapsi sunt: perpauci inde Pellam celerius quam ipse Perseus, quia recta et expedita via ierant, pervenerunt. Rex ad mediam ferme noctem errore [2] et variis difficultatibus viae est vexatus: in regia Perseo,[3] qui Pellae praeerant Euctus Eulaeusque et regii [4] pueri praesto erant. Contra ea amicorum, qui alii alio casu servati ex proelio Pellam venerant, cum saepe arcessiti essent, nemo ad eum venit. Tres erant tantum cum eo fugae comites, Euander Cretensis, Neo Boeotus [5] et Archidamus Aetolus. Cum iis iam metuens ne, qui venire ad se abnuerent, maius aliquid mox auderent, quarta vigilia profugit. Secuti eum sunt admodum quingenti Cretenses. Petebat Amphipolim; sed nocte a Pella exierat, properans ante lucem Axium amnem traicere, eum finem sequendi propter difficultatem transitus fore ratus Romanis.

[1] in silvam Fr.: inviam silvam V.

[2] errore Madvig: terrore V.

[3] viae est vexatus; in regia Perseo Novák: uidex vexatus in regiā estaperseo V.

[4] Euctus Eulaeusque et regii H. J. Müller: coactusque regi V.

[5] Neo Boeotus Madvig: cñ. euboetius V.

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xxiii, calls them "the mintmasters," and says that Perseus put them to death.

daylight would have remained for the victors to pursue, the entire Macedonian force would have been wiped out; as it was, the approach of night both sheltered the fugitives and inspired in the Romans a reluctance to pursue over unknown terrain. B.C. 168

XLIII. Perseus fled to the Pierian Forest along the military road with a large column of cavalry and the royal entourage. As soon as they arrived in the forest, where there were many divergent ways, and night was approaching, the king left the road with a very few of his most trusty men. The cavalry, left without a commander, took various routes in dispersing to their own cities; a very few went on to Pella more rapidly than the king, since they had gone by the direct and clear way. The king was bothered till about midnight by losing his way and by various difficulties of the route. At the palace Perseus was waited upon by the commanders of Pella, Euctus, and Eulaeus,[1] and the royal pages. On the other hand, of his friends who by various haps had come safely from the battle to Pella, not one came to him, though they were summoned many times. There were only three companions in flight with him, Evander the Cretan, Neon the Boeotian, and Archidamus the Aetolian. With these he escaped in the fourth watch, being now afraid that those who refused to come to him would presently venture on a bolder stroke. His escort was composed of about five hundred Cretans. He was making for Amphipolis; but he had left Pella at night because of his anxiety to cross the Axius River before dawn, since he thought that because of the difficulty of crossing this would be the limit of the Roman pursuit.

A.U.C. 586

XLIV. Consulem, cum se in castra victor recepisset, ne sincero gaudio frueretur, cura de minore filio sti-
2 mulabat. P. Scipio is erat, Africanus et ipse postea deleta Carthagine appellatus, naturalis consulis Pauli
3 filius,[1] adoptione Africani nepos. Is septimum decimum tunc annum agens, quod ipsum curam augebat, dum effuse sequitur hostes, in partem aliam turba ablatus erat; et serius cum redisset, tunc demum, recepto sospite filio, victoriae tantae gaudium consul sensit.

4 Amphipolim cum iam fama pugnae pervenisset concursusque matronarum in templum Dianae, quam Tauropolon vocant, ad opem exposcendam fieret, Diodorus, qui praeerat urbi, metuens ne Thraces, quorum duo milia in praesidio erant, urbem in tumultu diriperent, ab subornato ab se per fallaciam in tabel-
5 larii speciem litteras in foro medio accepit. Scriptum in iis erat ad Emathiam classem Romanam appulsam esse agrosque circa vexari; orare praefectos Emathiae
6 ut praesidium adversus populatores mittat. His lectis hortatur Thracas ut ad tuendam Emathiae oram proficiscantur: magnam eos caedem praedamque
7 palatis passim per agros Romanis facturos. Simul elevat famam adversae pugnae: quae si vera foret, alium super alium recentes ex fuga venturos fuisse.

[1] filius Duker: consulis V.

[1] The soldiers hailed him as imperator for the third time (Mommsen, Münzwesen 633, number 486).

[2] The district west of Amphipolis, toward the Chalcidic peninsula.

XLIV. When the consul returned victorious to B.C. 168 camp, he was prevented from enjoying an unalloyed delight by the sting of worry over his younger son. This was Publius Scipio, who was also called Africanus later after the destruction of Carthage, born son to the consul Paulus and by adoption grandson of Africanus. This son was then in his seventeenth year, a fact which in itself increased the anxiety for him, and had been carried away in another direction by a crowd while in hot pursuit of the enemy. When he returned very late, then at last on the safe recovery of his son the consul felt the joy of so great a victory.[1]

At Amphipolis the news of the battle had by now arrived; there was a gathering of the matrons in the temple of Diana whom they call Tauropolos, to pray for help. Diodorus, who was in charge of the city, feared that the Thracians, two thousand of whom were in the garrison, would plunder the city during the confusion. Hence he craftily hired a man to play the part of dispatch bearer, from whom he received papers in the middle of the market place. The message in these despatches was that the Roman fleet had put in at Emathia [2] and was harassing the surrounding countryside, and that the officers in charge of Emathia requested him to send a force against the ravagers. After reading this, he urged the Thracians to start out to defend the coast of Emathia, telling them that they would cause great slaughter and get great booty among the Romans scattered all over the fields. At the same time he minimized the report of the loss of a battle; if this were true, he said, man after man would have been arriving direct from the rout. Having got rid of 8 Per hanc causam Thracibus ablegatis, simul transgressos eos Strymonem vidit, portas clausit.

A.U.C. 586

XLV. Tertio die Perseus, quam pugnatum erat, 2 Amphipolim venit. Inde oratores cum caduceo ad Paulum misit. Interim Hippias et Midon et Pantauchus, principes amicorum regis, Beroea,[1] quo ex acie confugerant, ipsi ad consulem profecti Romanis se dedunt. Hoc idem et alii deinceps metu perculsi[2] 3 parabant facere. Consul nuntiis victoriae Q. Fabio filio et L. Lentulo et Q. Metello cum litteris Romam missis spolia iacentis hostium exercitus peditibus 4 concessit, equitibus praedam circumiecti agri, dum ne amplius duabus noctibus a castris abessent. Ipse 5 propius mare ad Pydnam castra movit. Beroea primum, deinde Thessalonica et Pella et deinceps 6 omnis ferme Macedonia intra biduum dedita. Pydnaei, qui proximi erant, nondum miserant legatos: multitudo incondita plurium simul gentium turbaque,[3] quae ex acie fuga in unum compulsa erat, consilium et consensum civitatis impediebat; nec clausae modo 7 portae, sed etiam inaedificatae erant. Missi Midon et Pantauchus sub muros ad conloquium Solonis qui praesidio praeerat;[4] per eum emittitur militaris turba. Oppidum deditum militibus datur diripiendum.

8 Perseus una tantum spe Bisaltarum auxilii temptata,[5] ad quos nequiquam miserat legatos, in con-

[1] Beroea Kreyssig: ueroeam V.
[2] alii deinceps metu perculsi J. F. Gronovius: aliae deinceps metu perculsae V.
[3] turbaque, quae Fr.: turbaeque V.
[4] praeerat J. F. Gronovius: erat V.
[5] temptata J. F. Gronovius: temptati V.

[1] A tribe living just west of Amphipolis.

the Thracians on this pretext, he barred the gates as B.C. 168 soon as he saw that they had crossed the Strymon.

XLV. On the second day after the battle Perseus arrived at Amphipolis. From there he sent ambassadors with the staff of Mercury to Paulus. Meanwhile Hippias, Midon, and Pantauchus, the chief among the king's friends, set out of their own accord from Beroea, where they had taken refuge after the battle, and surrendered to the Romans at the consul's camp. Others too, overcome with fear, were thereafter preparing to do the same. The consul sent as messengers of his victory his son Quintus Fabius, Lucius Lentulus, and Quintus Metellus with despatches to Rome and granted the spoils of the slain enemy to the infantry, and to the cavalry the right to plunder the surrounding territory, provided that they were not absent from camp for more than two nights. He himself moved camp nearer to the sea by Pydna. Beroea first, then Thessalonica and Pella, and then almost all Macedonia was surrendered within two days. The people of Pydna who were nearest had not yet sent envoys; a heterogeneous crowd of numerous nationalities together and the mob which had been amalgamated by flight from the battlefield were standing in the way of planning and agreement among the citizens. The gates were not only closed but built up solid. Midon and Pantauchus were sent up to the walls to confer with Solon, who was in charge of the garrison; through him dismissal of the mob of soldiers was arranged. The city when surrendered was given to the Roman troops to plunder.

After Perseus had tried his only expedient, to get aid from the Bisaltae,[1] to whom he sent envoys with-

A.U.C. 586

9 tionem processit Philippum secum filium habens, ut et ipsos Amphipolitanos et equitum peditumque qui aut se [1] persecuti aut fuga eodem delati erant adhor-
10 tando animos confirmaret. Sed aliquotiens dicere incipientem cum lacrimae praepedissent, quia ipse hiscere nequiit,[2] Euandro Cretensi editis, quae agi
11 cum multitudine vellet, de templo descendit. Multitudo, sicut ad conspectum regis fletumque tam miserabilem et ipsa ingemuerat lacrimaveratque, ita Euandri orationem aspernabatur; et quidam ausi sunt media ex contione succlamare "abite hinc, ne, qui pauci supersumus, propter vos pereamus."
12 Horum ferocia vocem Euandri clausit. Rex inde domum [3] se recepit pecuniaque et auro argentoque in lembos qui in Strymone stabant delatis et ipse ad
13 flumen descendit. Thraces navibus se committere non ausi domos dilapsi et alia militaris generis turba: [4] Cretenses spe [5] pecuniae secuti. Et quoniam in dividendo plus offensionum quam gratiae erat, quinquaginta talenta iis posita sunt in ripa diripienda.
14 Ab hac direptione cum per tumultum naves concenderent, lembum unum in ostio amnis multitudine gravatum merserunt. Galepsum [6] eo die, postero 15 Samothracam, quam petebant, perveniunt; ad duo milia talentum pervecta eo dicuntur.

XLVI. Paulus per omnes deditas civitates dimissis

[1] se Madvig: sem V.
[2] ipse hiscere nequiit Madvig: ipse scire nequid V.
[3] inde domum J. F. Gronovius: in domum V.
[4] alia . . . turba Madvig: aliae . . . turbae V.
[5] Cretenses spe H. J. Müller: cretensis spem V.
[6] Galepsum Sigonius: calipsum V.

[1] I.e., the speakers' stand, cf. VIII. xiv. 12, describing the consecration of the Roman Rostra.

out result, he appeared before an assembly bringing B.C. 168 his son Philip with him, in order to strengthen by exhortation the spirits of the people of Amphipolis themselves, and of the cavalry and infantry who had either accompanied him or had in their flight reached the same goal. He began to speak several times, but tears choked him, and when he could not open his mouth he instructed Evander the Cretan in the matters which he wished to discuss with the people and went down from the sacred spot.[1] At the sight of the king and his truly pitiable weeping the crowd itself groaned and wept; but with equal readiness they would have none of Evander's speech; and some dared to shout from the midst of the assembly, "Get away from here so that we few survivors may not perish on your account." The vehemence of these interruptions choked off Evander's speech. Thereafter the king went home, put his money, his gold, and his silver into the scout-ships which were moored in the Strymon and himself went down to the river. The Thracians and the rest of the mob of soldiers, not daring to trust themselves to ships, slipped away to their homes; the Cretans followed Perseus in hopes of cash. Because apportionment would create more hard feelings than gratitude, fifty talents were set out on the river-bank for them to scramble for. When after this scramble they were boarding the ships in riotous fashion, they sank one scout-ship at the mouth of the river by overcrowding it. On that day the party reached Galepsus, on the next Samothrace, their destination; it is said that two thousand talents were brought there.

XLVI. Paulus sent men to take charge of all the qui praeessent, ne qua iniuria in nova pace victis fieret, retentisque apud se caduceatoribus regis P. Nasicam, ignarus fugae regis, Amphipolim misit cum

A.U.C. 586

2 modica peditum equitumque manu, simul ut Sinticen evastaret et ad omnes conatus regi[1] impedimento
3 esset. Inter haec Meliboea a Cn. Octavio capitur diripiturque: ad Aeginium, ad quod oppugnandum Cn. Anicius legatus missus erat, ducenti[2] eruptione ex oppido facta amissi sunt ignaris Aeginiensibus debellatum esse.
4 Consul a Pydna profectus cum toto exercitu die altero Pellam pervenit et cum castra mille passus inde posuisset, per aliquot dies ibi stativa habuit, situm urbis undique aspiciens, quam non sine causa delec-
5 tam esse regiam animadvertit.[3] Sita est in tumulo vergente in occidentem hibernum; cingunt paludes inexsuperabilis altitudinis aestate et hieme, quas
6 restagnantes faciunt amnes.[4] Arx Phacus in ipsa palude, qua proxima urbi est, velut insula eminet, aggeri operis ingentis imposita, qui et murum sustineat
7 et umore circumfusae paludis nihil laedatur. Muro urbis coniuncta procul videtur; divisa est intermurali amni et eadem ponte iuncta, ut nec oppugnante externo aditum ab ulla parte habeat, nec, si quem ibi rex includat, ullum nisi per facillimae custodiae
8 pontem effugium. Et gaza regia in eo loco erat; sed
9 tum nihil praeter trecenta talenta quae missa Gentio regi, deinde retenta fuerant, inventum est. Per quos

[1] regi J. F. Gronovius: regis V.
[2] ducenti add. Fr.: om. V.
[3] animadvertit Wesenberg: advertit V.
[4] faciunt amnes. Arx Phacus Madvig: faciunt padeus V.

surrendered cities, so that no wrong should be done B.C. 168 to the conquered in the first days of peace; he kept the king's ambassadors with him and, since he did not know of the king's flight, sent Publius Nasica to Amphipolis with a small force of infantry and cavalry, both to ravage Sintica and to interfere with any moves of the king. Meanwhile Meliboea was captured and plundered by Gnaeus Octavius. At Aeginium, to besiege which the staff-officer Gnaeus Anicius had been sent, two hundred men were lost in a sally from the town because the people of Aeginium did not know that the war was over.

The consul set out from Pydna with his whole army and on the second day reached Pella, pitched camp a mile from there, and remained in this camp for a few days, examining the site of the city from all sides and noticing that it had not been chosen to be the capital without good reason. It is situated on a hill sloping to the south-west; swamps of a depth impenetrable in summer or winter surround it, formed by the ponding of rivers. The citadel Phacus projects like an island from the swamp itself, where it comes nearest the city, and is set on an embankment, a huge construction designed to bear the weight of a wall and remain undamaged by the water of the surrounding swamp. At a distance it appears to be joined to the city wall, but it is separated by a river within the walls and likewise connected by a bridge, so that there is no approach for a besieger from without nor is there any escape for anyone imprisoned by the king within, except over a very easily guarded bridge. The royal treasury was located there; but at that time nothing was found except the three hundred talents which had been sent to King Gentius and then withheld.

dies ad Peliam stativa fuerunt, legationes frequentes quae ad gratulandum convenerant, maxime ex Thessa-10 lia, auditae sunt. Nuntio deinde accepto Persea Samothracam traiecisse, profectus a Pella consul 11 quartis castris Amphipolim pervenit. Effusa omnis obviam[1] turba cuivis indicio erat non bono ac iusto rege orbavisse se Paulum . . .[2]

[1] obviam ed. Bas. 1535: obvia V.
[2] orbavisse se Paulum Wessely: obrauiss.s . . . V: lacuna parva.

During the days in camp at Pella, numerous embassies were received which came, especially from Thessaly, to offer congratulations. Then on receiving the news that Perseus had crossed to Samothrace, the consul set out from Pella and arrived at Amphipolis on the fourth day's march. The pouring out of the entire populace to meet him showed to any one that Paulus had not robbed them of a just and good king . . .[1] B.C. 168

[1] Lost at this point is the account of Paulus' entry into Amphipolis and his subsequent march to the eastward, cf. XLV. iv. 2.

PERIOCHA LIBRI XLIV

Q. Marcius Philippus per invios saltus penetravit Macedoniam et complures urbes occupavit. Rhodii miserunt legatos Romam minantes ut Perseo auxilio essent, nisi populus Romanus cum illo pacem atque amicitiam iungeret. Indigne id latum. Cum id bellum L. Aemilio Paulo, sequentis anni consuli iterum, mandatum esset Paulus in contione precatus, ut quidquid diri populo Romano immineret, in suam domum converteretur, et in Macedoniam profectus vicit Persen totamque Macedoniam in potestatem redegit. Antequam confligeret, praedixit exercitui ne miraretur quod luna proxima nocte defectura erat.[1] Gentius quoque, rex Illyricorum, cum rebellasset, a L. Anicio praetore victus venit in deditionem et cum uxore ac liberis et propinquis Romam missus est. Legati Alexandrini a Cleopatra et Ptolemaeo regibus venerunt querentes de Antiocho rege Syriae, quod is bellum inferret. Perseus sollicitatis in auxilium Eumene rege Pergami et Gentio rege Illyricorum, quia iis pecuniam quam promiserat non dabat, relictus ab his est.

[1] erat Rossbach: erait N (Palatinus Latinus 894), esset Boendermakerianus, Fr.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLIV

QUINTUS MARCIUS PHILIPPUS entered Macedonia over trackless passes and seized a number of cities. The Rhodians sent envoys to Rome threatening to help Perseus unless the Roman People established peace and friendship with him. This was regarded as an insult. When the campaign in Macedonia was put in charge of Lucius Aemilius Paulus, consul for the second time in the following year, Paulus prayed before an assembly that any disaster which threatened the Roman People might be turned against his own household,[1] and after setting out for Macedonia, he conquered Perseus and brought all Macedonia under control. Before the battle, he[2] announced beforehand to the army, to forestall surprise, that the moon was to be eclipsed on the following night. Gentius also, the king of Illyria, broke the peace with Rome and after being beaten by Lucius Anicius the praetor offered his submission and was sent to Rome with his wife, his children, and his relatives. Envoys from Alexandria came from Queen Cleopatra and King Ptolemy complaining of Antiochus, the king of Syria, because he was attacking them. Although Perseus had urged Eumenes, king of Pergamum, and Gentius, king of Illyria, to help him, he was abandoned by them because he withheld the money which he had promised them.

[1] This prayer of Paulus is mentioned below, XLV. xli. 8.

[2] Livy says Gallus, a staff-officer; Zonaras 9. 23, perhaps following this epitome, says Paulus made the announcement.

BOOK XLV

LIBER XLV

A.U.C. 586

I. Victoriae nuntii, Q. Fabius et L. Lentulus et Q. Metellus, quanta potuit adhiberi festinatio, celeriter Romam cum venissent, praeceptam[1] tamen eius rei 2 laetitiam invenerunt. Quarto post die quam cum rege est pugnatum, cum in circo ludi fierent, murmur repente populi tota spectacula pervasit pugnatum in 3 Macedonia et devictum regem esse; dein fremitus increvit; postremo clamor, plausus velut certo nuntio 4 victoriae allato est exortus. Mirari magistratus et quaerere auctorem repentinae laetitiae; qui postquam nullus erat, evanuit quidem tamquam certae rei gaudium, omen tamen laetum insidebat animis. 5 Quod postquam verius nuntiis Fabi Lentulique et Metelli adventu firmatum est, cum victoria ipsa, tum 6 augurio animorum suorum laetabantur. Et altera traditur[2] circensis turbae non minus similis veri laetitia. Ante diem quintum decimum kalendas

[1] praeceptam Ruperti: praeceptum V.

[2] et altera traditur Vahlen: et aliter editus V: et aliter traditur Fr.

---

[1] As the battle took place on Sept. 4, Livy thinks of these games as occurring on Sept. 7 by the then calendar (actually June 25, see above, pp. 87–89). It is not possible to establish exactly for this period the date of the Roman Games mentioned below; in the time of Augustus, they extended from Sept. 4 to Sept. 19, but were probably extended as time went on. The story of the mysterious announcement is told

BOOK XLV

I. The messengers of victory, Quintus Fabius, B.C. 168
Lucius Lentulus, and Quintus Metellus, summoned up the utmost possible speed and quickly arrived in Rome. Yet they found that the joy of their announcement had been anticipated. On the third day [1] after the battle with the king, while games were being celebrated in the circus, a rumour in the audience suddenly swept over the whole auditorium that a battle had been fought in Macedonia and the king beaten; then the buzz increased; finally there arose shouting and clapping, as if a definite report of victory had arrived. The magistrates were astonished and sought after the originator of this sudden rejoicing. When no such person was found, the rejoicing as if for an established fact died away, but the happy omen lurked nevertheless in men's minds. After confirmation came through the genuine report on the arrival of Fabius, Lentulus, and Metellus, men rejoiced both in the actual victory and in the prophetic power of their spirits. The story is told of a second rejoicing by the mob at the circus, which seemed no less genuine. On the sixteenth of also by Plutarch, Aemilius xxiv, who agrees with Livy in eliminating the gods from direct action on this occasion; according to Cicero, N.D. II. ii. 6, Valerius Maximus I. viii. 1, and Pliny, N.H. VII. xxii. 86, the news was proclaimed by Castor and Pollux.

U.C. 586 Octobres,[1] ludorum Romanorum secundo die, C. Licinio consuli ad quadrigas mittendas escendenti[2] tabellarius, qui se ex Macedonia venire diceret, laureatas
7 literas reddidisse[3] dicitur. Quadrigis missis consul currum conscendit et, cum per circum veheretur ad foros publicos, laureatas tabellas populo ostendit.
8 Quibus conspectis repente immemor spectaculi populus in medium decurrit. Eo senatum consul vocavit recitatisque tabellis ex auctoritate patrum pro foris publicis denuntiavit populo L. Aemilium collegam
9 signis conlatis cum rege Perseo pugnasse; Macedonum exercitum caesum fusumque; regem cum paucis fugisse; civitates omnes Macedoniae in dicio-
10 nem populi Romani venisse. His auditis clamor cum ingenti plausu ortus: ludis relictis domos magna pars hominum ad coniuges, liberos laetum 11 nuntium portabant. Tertius decimus dies erat ab eo, quo in Macedonia pugnatum est.

II. Postero die senatus in curia habitus, supplicationesque decretae et senatus consultum factum est, ut consul, quos praeter milites sociosque navales
2 coniuratos haberet, dimitteret: de militibus sociisque navalibus dimittendis referretur, cum legati ab L. Aemilio consule, a quibus praemissus tabellarius esset, venissent.[4] Ante diem sextum kal.

[1] ante diem quintum decimum kalendas Octobres Manutius: ad ix. k. octobrium V.
[2] escendenti Turnebus: extendenti V.
[3] reddidisse add. Sigonius: om. V.
[4] venissent add. Sigonius: om. V.

---

[1] These men under oath might be volunteers or veterans specially summoned (evocati); Servius, ad Aen. VIII. 1, describes coniuratio as a process of enrolling such special soldiers, as contrasted with a regular levy. But the reason for large numbers at this time may be the failure of the consul

September, on the second day of the Roman Games, B.C. 168
it is said that a messenger who said he came from Macedonia handed despatches wreathed with laurel to the consul Gaius Licinius as he was going up to start the chariot-race. When the race was over, the consul mounted his chariot and as he was being driven back to the reserved seats, showed the despatches to the people. At the sight of them the people at once forgot the show and rushed down into the arena. On the spot, the consul summoned the senate, had the despatches read, and on motion of the Fathers, announced to the people before the magistrates' seats that his colleague Lucius Aemilius had fought a pitched battle with King Perseus, that the Macedonian army had been slaughtered and routed, that the king had fled with but few followers, and that all the cities of Macedonia had come under the sway of the Roman people. On hearing this, shouting with great clapping of hands began; the games were deserted and most of the people took home the glad news to their wives and children. This was the twelfth day after the battle had taken place in Macedonia.

II. Next day the senate met in the senate-house, a thanksgiving was voted, and a resolution passed that the consul should discharge men whom he had under oath,[1] except soldiers and sailors, and that the question of dismissing soldiers and sailors should be put when the envoys who had sent the messenger ahead should arrive from the consul Lucius Aemilius. On the twenty-fifth day of September, about the in Italy to qualify as commander of Roman troops (see below, xii. 12) and the consequent holding at Rome of Roman levies intended for him.

u.c. 586

3 Octobres hora fere secunda legati urbem ingressi sunt: ingentem secum occurrentium, quacumque ibant, prosequentiumque trahentes turbam in forum
4 perrexerunt.[1] Senatus forte in curia erat; eo legatos consul introduxit. Ibi tantum temporis retenti dum exponerent, quantae regiae copiae peditum[2] equitumque fuissent, quot milia ex iis[3] caesa, quot
5 capta forent, quam paucorum militum iactura tanta hostium strages facta, quam praeceps[4] rex fugisset; existimari Samothraciam petiturum; paratam classem ad persequendum esse, neque terra neque mari
6 elabi posse. Eadem haec paulo post in contionem traducti exposuerunt; renovataque laetitia, cum consul edixisset, ut omnes aedes sacrae aperirentur, pro se quisque ex contione ad gratias agendas ire dis,
7 ingentique turba non virorum modo sed etiam feminarum compleri tota urbe[5] deorum immortalium templa.

8 Senatus revocatus in curiam supplicationes ob rem egregie gestam ab L. Aemilio consule in quinque dies circa omnia pulvinaria decrevit hostiisque maiori-
9 bus sacrificari iussit. Naves, quae in Tiberi paratae instructaeque stabant, ut, si res posceret,[6] in Mace-

[1] in forum perrexerunt Hiller: inforumaturbiperrexerunt V: in forum ad tribunal p. Fr: in forum ad curiam p. Weissenborn.

[2] quantae regiae copiae peditum Fr: quartae regiae peditum V.

[3] iis Wesenberg: his V.

[4] praeceps Heraeus: pauci V: pavide Madvig: cum quam paucis Kreyssig: raptim Giarratano.

[5] compleri tota urbe Neugebauer: conperta urbe V: conferta tota urbe Fr.

[6] si res posceret Vahlen: si res possit resistere V: si res poscere videretur Madvig.

second hour the envoys entered the city,[1] and made B.C. 168 their way to the forum, drawing after them a huge crowd of people who met them at every point on their way, and proceeded to escort them. The senate happened to be in the senate-house; the consul presented the envoys there. They were kept there just long enough to explain how large the king's forces of infantry and cavalry had been, how many thousand of them had been slain and how many captured, with the loss of how few of our men this great slaughter of the enemy had been accomplished, and how hastily the king had fled; it was thought, the envoys said, that he would make for Samothrace; the fleet was ready to pursue, and it would be impossible for him to slip away either by land or sea. On being brought before a meeting shortly thereafter, the envoys related the same facts. Joy broke out anew when the consul proclaimed that all sacred buildings should be opened; from the meeting, each citizen went of his own accord to offer thanks to the gods, and all over the city the temples of the immortal gods were filled with a huge throng, not only of men, but of women too.

The senate was recalled to the senate-house, voted that thanksgiving for the glorious achievement of the consul Lucius Aemilius should be observed for five days at all the banquet-tables of the gods, and ordered sacrifice offered with the larger victims. The ships which were moored in the Tiber ready and equipped to be sent to Macedonia, if circumstances

[1] The envoys seem not to have hurried, or to have been delayed by adverse winds in crossing the Adriatic; Paulus went from Brundisium to Phila in eleven days, with a visit to Delphi included, below, xli. 3.

A.U.C. 586

doniam mitterentur, subduci et in navalibus conlocari, socios navalis dato annuo stipendio dimitti et cum iis [1] omnes, qui in consulis verba iuraverant; et quod militum Corcyrae, Brundisi, ad mare superum aut in agro Larinati esset—omnibus his locis dispositus exercitus fuerat, cum quo, si res posceret, C. Licinius collegae ferret opem —, hos omnes milites dimitti placuit. Supplicatio pro contione populo [2] indicta est ex ante diem quintum idus Octobres cum eo die in quinque dies.

III. Ex Illyrico duo legati, C. Licinius Nerva et P. Decius, nuntiarunt exercitum Illyriorum caesum, Gentium regem captum, in dicione populi Romani Illyricum [3] esse. Ob eas res gestas ductu auspicioque L. Anici praetoris senatus in triduum supplicationes decrevit. Indictae [4] a consule sunt in ante diem [5] quartum et tertium et pridie idus Novembres.

Tradidere quidam legatos Rhodios nondum dimissos [6] post victoriam nuntiatam velut ad ludibrium stolidae superbiae in senatum vocatos esse; ibi Agepolim, principem eorum, ita locutum: missos esse legatos ab Rhodiis ad pacem inter Romanos et Persea faciendam, quod id bellum grave atque in-

[1] iis Wesenberg: his V.
[2] populo J. F. Gronovius: populi V.
[3] Romani Illyricum Madvig: Romani et Illyricum V.
[4] decrevit. Indictae Heraeus: decrevit. Iterum Latinae edictae Mommsen: decrevitur latinae dictae V: decrevit. indictae Latinae Hertz.
[5] diem add. Sigonius: om. V.
[6] dimissos Drakenborch: missos V.

demanded it, were to be put ashore and housed in B.C. 168 the ship-sheds; the sailors were to be discharged after receiving their year's pay, and with them, all those who had taken the oath before the consul. It was voted to discharge all soldiers who were in Corcyra, at Brundisium, along the Adriatic, or in the territory of Larinum—for an army had been distributed among all these places, to enable Gaius Licinius to bring aid to his colleague, if the situation demanded it. At a meeting a thanksgiving was proclaimed to the people for the eleventh of October and the four days following.

III. From Illyricum two envoys, Gaius Licinius Nerva and Publius Decius,[1] announced that the army of the Illyrians had been slaughtered, King Gentius was captured, and Illyricum was under the sway of the Roman people. For this achievement under the leadership and auspices of the praetor Lucius Anicius, the senate voted thanksgiving for three days. The date was proclaimed by the consul as the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth of November.

Some historians[2] relate that the ambassadors of the Rhodians, who had not yet been dismissed after the announcement of victory, were summoned to the senate, as if in mockery of their foolish pride, and that there Agepolis, their chief, spoke as follows: the envoys had been sent by the Rhodians to bring about peace between the Romans and Perseus, since the war between them was the cause of hardship

[1] In XLIV. xxxii. 4, Perpenna is given as the messenger, instead of these two.

[2] Apparently Polybius XXIX. 19 (7); in XLIV. xiv. 8–xv, Livy, following a Roman source, places the embassy a year too early.

A.U.C. 586

commodum Graeciae omni, sumptuosum ac damno-6 sum ipsis Romanis esset. Fortunam populi Romani bene fecisse, quod[1] finito aliter bello gratulandi[2] sibi de victoria egregia Romanis opportunitatem dedisset. Haec ab Rhodio dicta.

Responsum ab senatu esse: Rhodios nec utilitatium Graeciae cura neque[3] impensarum populi Romani, sed pro Perseo legationem eam mississe.
7 Nam si ea fuisset cura, quae simularetur, tum mittendos legatos fuisse, cum Perseus in Thessaliam exercitu inducto per biennium Graecas urbes alias obsideret, alias denuntiatione armorum terreret;
8 tum nullam pacis ab Rhodiis mentionem factam. Postquam superatos saltus transgressosque in Macedoniam Romanos audissent[4] et inclusum teneri Persea, tunc Rhodios legationem misisse, non ad ullam aliam rem quam ad Persea ex imminenti periculo eripiendum. Cum hoc responso legatos dimissos.

IV. Per eosdem dies et M. Marcellus, ex provincia Hispania decedens Marcolica nobili urbe capta, decem pondo auri et argenti ad summam sestertii[5] deciens in[6] aerarium rettulit.

2 Paulus Aemilius consul cum castra, ut supra dictum est, ad Siras terrae Odomanticae haberet, litterae ab

[1] fortunam populi Romani bene fecisse, quod Wesenberg: fortunambper beneficiis sequendo V.
[2] finito aliter bello gratulandi Fr: finito aliter bello sequendo aliter gratulandi V.
[3] cura neque Madvig: neque cura V.
[4] audissent Vahlen: audirent V.
[5] sestertii J. F. Gronovius: sestertium V.
[6] in add. Fr: om. V.

and injury to all Greece, and of expense and loss to B.C. 168
the Romans themselves. The good fortune of the Roman people had been kind to the Rhodians in giving them the opportunity, now that the war had been brought to an end by other means, of congratulating the Romans on their glorious victory. This was the speech of the Rhodian.

The answer of the senate was that the Rhodians had sent that embassy through concern neither for the welfare of Greece nor for the outlays of the Roman People, but on behalf of Perseus. For had their concern been as alleged, their envoys should have been sent when Perseus had led his army into Thessaly and for two years was besieging some Greek cities and alarming others with the threat of attack. At that time, there had been not a word about peace from the Rhodians. After they had heard that the Romans had overcome the passes and crossed into Macedonia, and that Perseus was surrounded, then the Rhodians sent an embassy for no other purpose than to snatch Perseus from the impending disaster. With this reply, the envoys were dismissed.

IV. About the same time Marcus Marcellus, on his return from Spain after taking the noted city of Marcolica, also deposited in the treasury ten pounds [1] of gold and silver of a value of one million sesterces.

As the consul Aemilius Paulus was encamped near Sirae in the Odomantian territory, as was mentioned

[1] The weight of metal is obviously too small for the value given, but it is not easy to propose an emendation. The lb. of silver probably = 336 sesterces; the lb. of gold probably = 4000 sesterces (cf. Vol. XI. 192, note 4). Could MDC pondo become decem pondo by scribal error? It is perhaps easier to assume the loss of the first figures of the correct number; but the number suggested is of the proper order.

A.U.C. 586

rege Perseo per ignobiles tres legatos ei adlatae sunt. Quos cum flentes ac sordidatos [1] cerneret, et ipse in- 3 lacrimasse dicitur sorti [2] humanae, quod qui paulo ante non contentus regno Macedoniae Dardanos Illyriosque oppugnasset, Bastarnarum adcivisset [3] auxilia, is tum amisso exercitu, extorris regno, in parvam insulam compulsus, supplex, fani religione 4 non viribus suis tutus esset. Sed postquam regem Persea consuli Paulo salutem legit, miserationem omnem stultitia ignorantis fortunam suam exemit. 5 Itaque, quamquam in reliqua parte litterarum minime regiae preces erant, tamen sine responso ac sine litteris ea legatio dimissa est. Sensit Perseus, 6 cuius nominis obliviscendum victo esset; itaque alterae litterae cum privati nominis titulo missae et petiere et impetravere, ut aliqui ad eum mitterentur, cum quibus loqui de statu et condicione suae fortunae 7 posset. Missi sunt tres legati, P. Lentulus, A. Postumius Albinus, A. Antonius. Nihil ea legatione perfectum est, Perseo regium nomen omni vi amplectente, Paulo ut se suaque omnia in fidem et clementiam populi Romani permitteret tendente.[4]

V. Quae [5] dum aguntur, classis Cn. Octavi Samothracam est appulsa. Is quoque praesenti admoto terrore modo minis, modo spe perlicere ut se traderet cum [6] conaretur, adiuvit in hoc eum res seu casu

[1] ei adlatae sunt. Quos cum flentes ac sordidatos add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[2] sorti Vascosanus: sortis V.
[3] adcivisset J. F. Gronovius: ciuisse V.
[4] et clementiam populi Romani permitteret tendente Kreyssig: et pr. permittereclетendente V.
[5] Quae add. Heraeus: om. V.
[6] cum add. Fr: om. V.

above,[1] despatches from King Perseus were brought B.C. 168 to him by three envoys of no rank. When Paulus perceived them in soiled garb and with tears streaming, it is said that he himself wept for the lot of man, since that king who shortly before, discontented with the kingdom of Macedonia, had attacked the Dardanians and Illyrians and summoned the Bastarnae to his aid, had now lost his army, and, stripped of his kingdom and driven to a small island, was a suppliant, protected by the sanctity of a temple, not by his own powers. But after he read "King Perseus to the Consul Paulus, greeting," the folly of the man who did not realize the state of his fortunes erased all pity. Therefore, although the body of the letter contained entreaties far from royal, yet that embassy was dismissed without an answer and without dispatches. Perseus understood what title the conquered must forget; therefore other dispatches, sent under his name without title, requested and obtained the sending of certain persons with whom he might discuss the status and the terms of his new lot. Three envoys were sent, Publius Lentulus, Aulus Postumius Albinus, and Aulus Antonius. Nothing was accomplished by that embassy, since Perseus clung with all his might to the title of king, while Paulus urged him to entrust himself and all he had to the discretion and mercy of the Roman People.

V. While these negotiations were under way, the fleet of Gnaeus Octavius put in at Samothrace. He too was attempting to entice the king to surrender now by menaces, now by hope, while the threat of force was kept imminent, when a matter brought about either by chance or plan lent him assistance in his

[1] The mention of Sirae has been lost at the end of XLIV.

A.U.C. 586

2 contracta seu consilio. L. Atilius, illustris adulescens, cum in contione esse populum Samothracum animum advertisset, a magistratibus petit,[1] ut sibi paucis adloquendi populi potestatem facerent.
3 Permisso " utrum nos, hospites Samothraces, vere accepimus an falso sacram hanc insulam et augusti
4 totam atque inviolati soli esse? " cum creditae sanctitati adsentirentur omnes, " cur igitur " inquit " polluit[2] eam homicida, sanguine regis Eumenis violavit, et cum omnis praefatio sacrorum[3] eos quibus non sint purae manus sacris arceat, vos penetralia vestra contaminari cruento latronis corpore sinetis? "
5 Nobilis fama erat apud omnes Graeciae civitates Eumenis regis per Euandrum Delphis prope perpe-
6 trata caedes. Itaque, praeterquam quod in potestate Romanorum sese insulamque totam et templum cernebant esse, ne inmerito quidem ea sibi exprobrari rati, Theondan qui summus magistratus apud eos erat—regem ipsi appellant—, ad Persea mittunt, qui nuntiaret argui caedis Euandrum Cretensem;
7 esse autem iudicia apud sese more maiorum comparata de iis, qui incestas manus intulisse intra
8 terminos sacratos templi dicantur; si confideret Euander innoxium se rei capitalis argui, veniret ad causam dicendam; si committere se iudicio non auderet, liberaret religione templum ac sibimet ipse consuleret.

[1] Samothracum animum advertisset, a magistratibus petit Fr: samotra crumanimumadversossedadmagistratibuspetit V.

[2] polluit Vahlen: pollui V: pollutam Fr: pollutus Madvig.

[3] sacrorum Fr: rum V.

---

[1] Described in XLII. xv–xvi.

undertaking. Lucius Atilius, a prominent young man, noticing that the people of Samothrace were in meeting, requested the magistrates for permission to address the people briefly. Permission being granted, he asked, B.C. 168

"My hosts of Samothrace, is our understanding correct or false that this island is sacred, and all its soil is revered and unprofaned?" When all agreed that it was as sacred as he believed, he said, "Why then has a murderer polluted it, profaned it with the blood of King Eumenes, and although the preamble to every rite warns away from the holy things those whose hands are not pure, why do you yet permit your sanctuary to be defiled by the blood-stained person of a brigand?"

The story how Evander had nearly succeeded in murdering King Eumenes at Delphi[1] had been bruited abroad throughout all the cities of Greece. Consequently, the Samothracians decided that, apart from the fact that they saw that they and their whole island and shrine were in the power of the Romans, the reproach against them was a just one. They sent Theondas, the chief magistrate of their community—they call him "king"—to Perseus to announce that Evander the Cretan was being accused of murder; that there was a court of theirs established by ancestral custom to try those who were alleged to have brought unclean hands within the sacred precincts of the temple; and that if Evander trusted that he was innocent of the capital charge brought against him, he should appear to defend himself, whereas, if he dared not entrust himself to the court, he should free the temple of profanation, and provide for his own safety.

A.U.C. 586

9 Perseus sevocato[1] Euandro iudicium subeundi nullo pacto auctor[2] esse: nec causa nec gratia parem fore. Suberat et ille metus, ne damnatus auctorem se nefandi facinoris protraheret. Reliqui[3] quid esse, 10 nisi ut fortiter moriatur? Nihil palam abnuere Euander; sed cum veneno se malle mori quam ferro dixisset, occulte fugam parabat. Quod cum renuntiatum regi esset, metuens, ne tamquam a se subtracto poenae reo iram Samothracum in se con- 11 verteret, interfici Euandrum iussit. Qua perpetrata temere caede subit extemplo animum, in se nimirum receptam labem, quae Euandri fuisset; ab illo Delphis volneratum Eumenen, ab se Samothracae Euandrum occisum; ita duo sanctissima in terris templa se uno auctore sanguine humano violata. 12 Huius rei crimen corrupto pecunia Theonda avertit, ut[4] renuntiaret populo Euandrum sibi ipsum mortem conscisse.

VI. Ceterum tanto facinore in unicum relictum amicum admisso,[5] per tot casus expertum proditumque, quia non prodiderat, omnium ab se abalienavit animos. Pro se quisque transire ad Romanos, 2 fugaeque consilium capere solum prope relictum coegerunt; Oroandem denique[6] Cretensem, cui nota Threciae ora erat quia mercaturas in ea regione fecerat, appellat ut se sublatum in[7] lembum ad

[1] sevocato Drakenborch: evocato V.
[2] auctor Fr: res V.
[3] reliqui Sigonius: reliquid V.
[4] Theonda avertit, ut Madvig: Theodonavertiturut V.
[5] admisso Madvig: amisson V.
[6] Oroandem denique Harant: oroeandemque V: Oroandemque Fr:
[7] in add. Fr: om. V.

Perseus called Evander aside and said that he by B.C. 168
no means advised him to stand trial, for he would have neither a good case nor sufficient influence. (Behind his words was the fear that Evander, if condemned, would reveal the king as the sponsor of the abominable crime.) What was there left, said Perseus, except to die bravely? Evander made no open refusal, but saying that he preferred to die by poison rather than the steel, he secretly made ready for escape. When this was reported to the king, he feared that the anger of the Samothracians would turn against him, on the ground that he had caused the guilty party to escape punishment; so he ordered Evander killed. When this murder had been hastily perpetrated, it suddenly occurred to Perseus that he had beyond doubt taken on himself the guilt of Evander. The latter had wounded Eumenes at Delphi, he had killed Evander at Samothrace; and so two of the most sacred shrines on earth had been profaned with human blood at his sole instigation. He turned aside accusation on this score by bribing Theondas to report to the people that Evander had committed suicide.

VI. However, when he committed this terrible crime against his pre-eminent remaining friend, who had been tested in so many vicissitudes and had been betrayed because he had not betrayed the king, Perseus turned all hearts against him. Each one individually deserted to the Romans.

By fleeing they forced the king too, left almost alone, to adopt some plan of flight; finally he appealed to Oroandes the Cretan, who knew the coast of Thrace from having made trading voyages there, to take him aboard a scout-ship and carry him

A.U.C. 586

3 Cotym deveheret. Demetrium est portus in promunturio quodam Samothracae; ibi lembus stabat. Sub occasum solis deferuntur quae ad usum necessaria erant: defertur et pecunia quanta clam deferri 4 poterat. Rex ipse nocte media cum tribus consciis fugae per[1] posticum aedium in propinquum cubiculo hortum atque inde maceriam aegre trans- 5 gressus ad mare pervenit. Oroandes tantum moratus,[2] dum pecunia deferretur, primis tenebris solverat 6 navem ac per altum Cretam petebat. Postquam in portu navis non inventa est, vagatus Perseus aliquamdiu in litore, postremo timens lucem iam adpropinquantem, in hospitium redire non ausus in latere templi prope angulum obscurum delituit.

7 Pueri regii apud Macedonas vocabantur principum liberi ad ministerium electi regis; ea cohors persecuta regem fugientem ne tum quidem abscedebat, donec iussu Cn. Octavi pronuntiatum est per prae- 8 conem regios pueros Macedonasque alios, qui Samothracae essent, si transirent ad Romanos, incolumitatem libertatemque et sua omnia servaturos, quae aut secum haberent[3] aut in Macedonia reliquissent. 9 Ad hanc vocem transitio omnium facta est, nominaque dabant ad C. Postumium tribunum militum. Liberos

[1] per add. Fr: om. V.
[2] moratus add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[3] quae aut secum haberent Fr: haud aecum habere V.

---

[1] A temple of Demeter stood there, cf. below, sec. 6. The temple is mentioned in I.G. XII. 8. The promontory of Kamariotissa marks the site approximately.

[2] Perseus' wife accompanied him, according to Plutarch, to Cotys. There is a harbour Demetrium on a B.C. 168 certain headland of Samothrace;[1] the scout-ship was anchored there. At sun-down the needful equipment was carried to the shore; all the money that could be brought secretly was also carried down. In the middle of the night, the king himself with three companions of his flight went by a back door of the house into a garden next to his bedroom and thence, after scrambling with difficulty over a wall, reached the sea.[2] Oroandes had waited just long enough for the money to be brought down, and in the early darkness had weighed anchor and was sailing directly for Crete. When the ship was not found at the harbour, Perseus wandered about for some time on the shore and, finally, fearing the imminent approach of dawn, did not dare to return to the house where he was entertained, but took cover near an out-of-the-way corner on one side of the temple.

Among the Macedonians there were Royal Pages,[3] so-called, sons of the chief men chosen to wait upon the king; this troop, having accompanied the king in his flight had not even then left him, until by order of Gnaeus Octavius, announcement was made by a herald that if the Royal Pages and the other Macedonians who were in Samothrace surrendered to the Romans, they would secure their safety, their freedom, and all their possessions which they either had with them, or had left in Macedonia. At this word, they all made their way to the Romans, and reported their names to Gaius Postumius, a military tribune. The king's young children were also handed over to Aemilius xxvi, and was one of the causes of delay, being quite unathletic.

[3] These pages are also described by Curtius VIII. vi. 2.

A.U.C. 586

quoque parvos regios Ion Thessalonicensis Octavio tradidit, nec quisquam praeter Philippum, maximum 10 natu e [1] filiis, cum rege relictus. Tum sese filiumque Octavio tradidit, fortunam deosque, quorum in templo erat,[2] nulla ope supplicem iuvantis accusans.
11 In praetoriam navem imponi iussus, eodem et pecunia quae superfuit delata est: extemploque classis
12 Amphipolim repetit. Inde Octavius regem in castra ad consulem misit praemissis litteris, ut in potestate eum esse et adduci sciret.

VII. Secundam eam Paulus, sicut erat, victoriam ratus victimas cecidit eo nuntio, et consilio advocato litteras [3] praetoris cum recitasset, Q. Aelium Tuberonem obviam regi misit, ceteros manere in praetorio
2 frequentis iussit. Non alias ad ullum spectaculum tanta multitudo occurrit. Patrum aetate Syphax rex captus in castra Romana adductus erat; praeterquam quod nec sua nec gentis fama comparandus, tantum accessio [4] Punici belli fuerat, sicut Gentius
3 Macedonici; Perseus caput belli erat, nec ipsius tantum patris avique ceterorumque,[5] quos sanguine et [6] genere contingebat, fama conspectum eum efficiebat, sed effulgebant Philippus ac magnus Alexander, qui summum imperium in orbe terrarum
4 Macedonum fecerant. Pullo amictu cum filio [7]

[1] natu e Kreyssig: natum et V.
[2] quorum in templo erat Drakenborch: quorum tĕ ploerantnullotemplo V: quorum templum erat J. F. Gronovius: quorum in templo erant, nulla tutela Gitlbauer.
[3] litteras add. Fr: om. V.
[4] tantum accessio Giarratano: tunc quod nec sua accessio V: tunc quoque accessio Fr: etiam quod accessio Harant.
[5] ceterorumque add. Madvig: om. V.
[6] et Hartel: at V.
[7] amictu cum filio Graevius: amictus illo V.

Octavius by Ion of Thessalonica, and no one was left with the king except Philip, his oldest son. Then Perseus surrendered himself and his son to Octavius, railing at his fortune and the gods in whose temple he was, who had done nothing to aid their suppliant.[1] He was ordered to be placed in the flagship, and what was left of the money was brought there. The fleet immediately sailed back to Amphipolis. Thence Octavius sent the king to the consul's camp, sending ahead dispatches to inform the consul that the king was a prisoner and was being brought to him. B.C. 168

VII. Thinking that this was a second victory, as indeed it was, Paulus offered sacrifice at this message; he read the letter of the praetor before his assembled council, sent Quintus Aelius Tubero[2] to meet the king, and ordered the others to remain in full numbers at headquarters. So great a crowd never gathered elsewhere for any sight. In the previous generation King Syphax[3] had been brought as prisoner into a Roman camp, but apart from the fact that he was not comparable either as to his own reputation or that of his nation, he was a mere appendage to the war with Carthage, as Gentius was to this one with Macedonia. Perseus was the chief enemy, and not only his own reputation and that of his father, grandfather, and the rest to whom he was related by blood and stock made him a cynosure, but the glory of Philip and Alexander the Great, who made the Macedonians masters of the world, radiated

[1] Diodorus XXIX. 28 points out that he had forfeited his claim on the gods by his disloyalty toward his brother.

[2] The son-in-law of Paulus, according to Plutarch, Aemilius V.

[3] His story is told in XXX. xiii.

A.U.C. 586

Perseus ingressus est castra nullo suorum alio comite, qui socius calamitatis miserabiliorem eum faceret. Progredi prae turba occurrentium ad spectaculum non poterat, donec a consule lictores missi sunt,[1] qui summoto iter ad praetorium facerent. Consurrexit consul iussis[2] sedere aliis progressusque paulum introeunti regi dextram porrexit summittentemque se ad pedes sustulit nec attingere genua passus introductum in tabernaculum adversus advocatos in consilium considere iussit.

VIII. Prima percontatio fuit, qua subactus iniuria contra populum Romanum bellum tam infesto animo suscepisset, quo se regnumque suum ad ultimum discrimen adduceret? Cum responsum expectantibus cunctis terram intuens diu tacitus fleret, rursus[3] consul: "si iuvenis regnum accepisses, minus equidem mirarer ignorasse te, quam gravis aut amicus aut inimicus esset populus Romanus; nunc vero, cum et bello patris tui quod nobiscum gessit interfuisses, et pacis postea, quam cum summa fide adversus eum coluimus, meminisses, quod fuit consilium,[4] quorum et vim in[5] bello et fidem in pace expertus esses, cum iis tibi bellum esse quam pacem malle?" Nec interrogatus nec accusatus cum responderet, "utcumque tamen haec, sive errore humano seu casu seu necessitate inciderunt, bonum animum habe.

[1] missi sunt Madvig: misissent V.
[2] consul iussis Luterbacher: consul et iussis V.
[3] rursus Wesenberg: iussu V.
[4] meminisses, quod fuit consilium Madvig: meminisset consilium V.
[5] in add. Drakenborch: om. V.

from him. Perseus entered the camp in dark- B.C. 168 coloured garb, with his son, but unattended by any other of his people whose presence as a sharer of his downfall might have made him more pitiable. He was unable to proceed because of the crowd rushing to gaze at him, until lictors were sent by the consul to clear a path to the headquarters. The consul rose to meet him, though he ordered the others to keep their seats, and advancing a few steps offered his hand to the king as he entered, raised him when he fell at his feet, not allowing him to clasp his knees, brought him into the tent, and bade him be seated opposite the officers called as council.

VIII. The first question put was, by what wrong had he been driven to make war on the Roman People with such determined enmity as to bring himself and his kingdom into utmost danger? While all awaited an answer, he gazed silently at the ground for a long time and wept.

Then the consul asked again: "If you had received the kingdom as a young man, I should indeed be less surprised that you were unaware how powerful the Roman People is as a friend or as an enemy. As it is, since you had a part in the war which your father waged with us, and since you were aware of the peace that followed, which we observed with the utmost faithfulness toward him, what reasoning led you to prefer war rather than peace with men whose power in war, whose good faith in peace, you had alike tested?"

When no reply either to the question or the accusation was forthcoming, the consul continued, "However that may be, whether it has occurred through human mistake or chance or law of nature, be of good

A.U.C. 586

Multorum regum populorumque[1] casibus cognita populi Romani clementia non modo spem tibi, sed prope certam fiduciam salutis praebet."

6 Haec Graeco sermone Perseo; Latine deinde suis "exemplum insigne cernitis" inquit "mutationis rerum humanarum. Vobis hoc praecipue dico, iuvenes. Ideo in secundis rebus nihil in quemquam superbe ac violenter consulere decet nec praesenti credere fortunae, cum quid vesper ferat incertum sit.

7 Is demum vir erit, cuius animum neque prosperae res flatu[2] suo efferent[3] nec adversae infringent."

8 Consilio dimisso tuendi cura regis Q. Aelio mandatur. Eo die et invitatus ad consulem Perseus et alius omnis ei honos habitus est, qui haberi in tali fortuna poterat.

Exercitus deinde in hiberna dimissus est. IX. Maximam partem copiarum Amphipolis, reliquas propinquae urbes acceperunt.

2 Hic finis belli, cum quadriennium continuum bellatum esset, inter Romanos ac Persea fuit idemque finis incluti per Europae plerumque atque Asiam omnem

3 regni. Vicensimum ab Carano, qui primus regnabat, Persea numerabant. Perseus Q. Fulvio L.[4] Manlio consulibus regnum accepit, a senatu rex est appellatus M. Iunio A. Manlio consulibus; regnavit undecim

4 annos. Macedonum gens[5] obscura admodum fama

[1] populorumque H. J. Müller: populorum V.
[2] prosperae res flatu Wesenberg: prospere flatu V.
[3] efferent Madvig: efferet V.
[4] L. add. Fr: om. V.
[5] gens add. Madvig: om. V.

[1] Justinus XXXIII. 2. 6 says the thirtieth king, Eusebius (Schöne I, col. 242), the thirty-ninth. Herodotus VIII. 138, names Perdiccas as the founder of the dynasty.

cheer. The misfortunes of many kings and of many B.C. 168 peoples have shown that the mercy of the Roman People offers you not only hope, but an almost positive assurance of safety."

This the consul said in Greek to Perseus; then he continued in Latin to his staff: "You see before you a notable example of the changefulness of human affairs. I say this especially for you, young men. Therefore it is proper to offer no insult or violence to anyone, while one is in favourable circumstances, and not to trust to one's present fortune, since no one knows what evening will bring. He will be truly a man, in a word, whose spirit is neither deflected from its course by the breath of prosperity, nor broken by misfortune."

When the meeting was dismissed, the task of guarding the king was assigned to Quintus Aelius. On that day Perseus was entertained by the consul, and every other token of respect was shown him which could be shown under such circumstances.

The army was then released to winter quarters. IX. Amphipolis received most of the troops, the nearby cities the rest.

This was the end of the war between the Romans and Perseus, after four years of steady campaigning, and also the end of a kingdom famed over a large part of Europe and all of Asia. They reckoned Perseus as the twentieth after Caranus, who founded the kingdom.[1] Perseus ascended the throne in the consulship of Quintus Fulvius and Lucius Manlius, and was recognized as king by the senate in the consulship of Marcus Junius and Aulus Manlius; his reign lasted eleven years. The Macedonian nation was of no great reputation until the time of

A.U.C. 586

usque ad Philippum, Amyntae filium, fuit; inde ac per eum crescere eum coepisset, Europae se tamen finibus continuit, Graeciam omnem et partem
5 Threciae atque Illyrici amplexa. Superfudit deinde se in Asiam, et tredecim annis, quibus Alexander regnavit, primum omnia, qua Persarum prope immenso spatio imperium fuerat, suae dicionis fecit;
6 Arabas hinc Indiamque, qua terrarum ultimos[1] finis
7 rubrum mare amplectitur, peragravit. Tum maximum in[2] terris Macedonum regnum nomenque; inde morte Alexandri distractum in multa regna, dum ad se quisque opes rapiunt, laceratis viribus[3] a summo culmine fortunae ad ultimum finem centum quinquaginta annos stetit.

X. Victoriae Romanae fama cum pervasisset in Asiam, Antenor, qui cum classe lemborum ad Phanas
2 stabat, Cassandriam inde traeicit. C. Popilius, qui ad Delum[4] in praesidio navibus Macedoniam petentibus erat, postquam debellatum in Macedonia et statione summotos hostium lembos audivit, dimissis et ipse Attali[5] navibus ad susceptam lega-
3 tionem peragendam navigare Aegyptum pergit, ut prius occurrere Antiocho posset quam ad Alexandreae
4 moenia accederet. Cum praeterveherentur Asiam legati et Loryma[6] venissent, qui portus viginti paulo amplius milia ab Rhodo abest, ex adverso urbi ipsi

[1] ultimos J. F. Gronovius: ultimus V.
[2] in add. Fr: om. V.
[3] laceratis viribus J. F. Gronovius: lacereā lesuiribus V.
[4] ad Delum Fr: delun V.
[5] Attali sive Attalicis Luterbacher: adticis V: Asiaticis Harant: adventiciis Madvig.
[6] Loryma Fr: loriam V.

Philip, son of Amyntas. Later, when it had proceeded B.C. 168 to expand under him, it was still confined within the bounds of Europe, though embracing all Greece and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Thereafter it overflowed into Asia, and Alexander, in the thirteen years of his reign, first brought under his sway all the well-nigh boundless empire that had belonged to the Persians, and then traversed Arabia and India, where the Indian Ocean embraces the uttermost ends of the earth. At that time the empire and name of the Macedonians was greatest on earth; thereafter at the death of Alexander it was torn into many kingdoms, as each leader snatched at resources for his own account, and its strength was dismembered; yet it endured for a hundred and fifty years[1] from the topmost pinnacle of its fortune to its final end.

X. When a report of the Roman victory penetrated to Asia, Antenor, who was lying off Phanae with his fleet of scout-ships, crossed from there to Cassandria.[2] When Gaius Popilius, who was at Delos to protect ships making for Macedonia, heard that the war had been brought to an end in Macedonia and that the enemy scout-ships had left their post, he for his part dismissed the ships of Attalus and proceeded to sail for Egypt to complete the mission on which he had started, so that he might be able to meet Antiochus before he reached the walls of Alexandria. As the ambassadors were sailing past Asia and came to Loryma, a harbour slightly more than twenty miles from Rhodes and situated

[1] Polybius XXIX. 21 (6c) gives this figure; it was 155 years from the death of Alexander.

[2] This naval activity was described in XLIV. xxix. 1–5.

u.c. 586

positus, principes Rhodiorum occurrunt—iam enim eo quoque victoriae fama perlata erat—orantes, ut Rhodum deveherentur: pertinere id ad famam salutemque civitatis, noscere ipsos omnia quae acta essent quaeque[1] agerentur Rhodi, et comperta per se, non volgata fama Romam referre. Diu negantes pepulerunt, ut moram navigationis brevem pro salute sociae urbis paterentur. Postquam Rhodum ventum est, in contionem quoque eos iidem precibus pertraxerunt. Adventus legatorum auxit potius timorem civitati quam minuit: omnia enim Popilius quae singuli universique eo bello hostiliter dixerant fecerantque rettulit, et vir asper ingenio augebat atrocitatem eorum quae dicerentur voltu truci et accusatoria voce, ut, cum propriae simultatis nulla causa cum civitate ei[2] esset, ex unius senatoris Romani acerbitate, qualis in se universi senatus animus esset, coniectarent.

C. Decimi moderatior oratio fuit,[3] qui in plerisque eorum quae commemorata a Popilio essent culpam non penes populum, sed penes paucos concitores volgi esse dixit: eos venalem linguam habentis decreta plena regiae adsentationis fecisse et eas legationes misisse, quarum Rhodios semper non minus puderet quam paeniteret. Quae omnia, si sana mens[4] populo foret, in capita noxiorum versura.

[1] quaeque Madvig: q. V.
[2] civitate ei Harant: civitates V.
[3] coniectarent. C. Decimi moderatior oratio fuit, qui Fr: coniectarentur cum Decimi moderatio fuitque V.
[4] sana mens Weissenborn: tamen V.

[1] On the peninsula northward from Rhodes; mentioned by Thucydides VIII. 43, and Strabo XIV. ii. 4 and 14 (652, 655).

exactly opposite to the city,[1] the chief men of Rhodes B.C. 168 met them (for the report of the victory had by now been brought to that city also) with the request that they put in at Rhodes; for, said the Rhodians, it was a matter touching the reputation and safety of their city that the envoys should personally become acquainted with everything which had been done and was being done at Rhodes, and that they should carry back to Rome facts ascertained by themselves, not popular rumours. After many refusals, they induced the envoys to endure a short delay of their voyage for the sake of the safety of an allied city. After their arrival at Rhodes, the same leaders also dragged them by entreaty before an assembly. The arrival of the envoys increased rather than diminished the fear of the city; for Popilius rehearsed every hostile word or act during this war either on the part of individuals or of the commonwealth, and being a man of harsh temperament, he increased the savage effect of his remarks by his grim face and prosecutor's tone, so that, since he had no reason for a personal quarrel with Rhodes, the people guessed from the bitterness of one Roman senator what the attitude of the whole senate was toward them.

The speech of Gaius Decimius was milder, for he laid the blame for many of the offences mentioned by Popilius not at the door of the people as a whole, but at that of a few agitators; these, he said, whose tongues were for sale, had written the decrees full of fawning upon the king and had sent those embassies concerning which the Rhodians had always felt as much shame as regret. All these acts, said Decimius, would, if the people's reason was sound, recoil upon the heads of the guilty.

u.c. 586

12 Cum magno adsensu auditus est, non magis eo quod multitudinem noxa levabat quam quod culpam
13 in auctores verterat. Itaque cum principes Rhodiorum Romanis responderent, nequaquam tam [1] grata oratio eorum fuit qui quae Popilius obiecerat diluere utcumque conati sunt, quam eorum qui Decimio in auctoribus ad piaculum noxae obiciendis adsensi sunt.
14 Decretum igitur extemplo ut qui pro Perseo adversus Romanos dixisse quid aut fecisse convincerentur, capitis [2] condemnarentur. Excesserant [3] urbe sub adventum [4] Romanorum quidam, alii mortem sibi
15 consciverunt. Legati non ultra quam quinque dies Rhodi morati Alexandream proficiscuntur. Nec eo segnius iudicia ex decreto coram iis [5] facto Rhodii exercebant; [6] quam perseverantiam in exsequenda re tam Decimi lenitas quam Popili effecerat asperitas.[7]

XI. Cum [8] haec gererentur, Antiochus frustra temptatis moenibus Alexandreae abscesserat ceteraque Aegypto potitus, relicto Memphi maiore Ptolemaeo, cui [9] regnum quaeri suis viribus simulabat, ut
2 victorem mox adgrederetur, in Syriam exercitum abduxit. Nec huius voluntatis eius ignarus Ptolemaeus, dum conterritum obsidionis metu minorem fratrem haberet, posse se recipi Alexandreae et

[1] tam Doering: tamentam V.
[2] capitis Fr: faciliscapitis C.
[3] excesserant Madvig: excesserunt V.
[4] adventum Bas: adventu V.
[5] iis Wesenberg: hi V.
[6] facto Rhodii exercebant Vahlen: facti Rhodii exercebantur V.
[7] perseverantiam in exsequenda re tam Decimi lenitas quam Popili effecerat asperitas H. J. Müller: perseverabant tam in exsequenda re tam Decimae lenitas quam V.
[8] Cum add. Fr: om. V.

There was great approval felt for his speech, but no B.C. 168 more because he relieved the commons of blame than because he assigned responsibility to the guilty. And so when the leaders of the Rhodians answered the Romans, their speeches were by no means as pleasing when the speaker tried at all costs to extenuate the charges made by Popilius, as when he agreed with Decimius in urging that the responsible persons should expiate their wrong. A decree was therefore passed at once that anyone convicted of saying or doing anything against the Romans in behalf of Perseus should be put to death. Some had left the city on the arrival of the Romans, others committed suicide. After a delay of not more than five days at Rhodes, the ambassadors left for Alexandria. The Rhodians proceeded no less zealously to prosecute trials according to the decree passed in the presence of the Romans. This unflagging zeal in carrying the matter out was produced as much by the mildness of Decimius as by the harshness of Popilius.

XI. While this was going on, Antiochus had left Alexandria after an unsuccessful trial of the fortifications and had taken control of the rest of Egypt. He left at Memphis the elder Ptolemy[1] whose claim to the throne he was pretending to support with his army, in order that he might attack the winner presently, and led his army off into Syria. Ptolemy was well aware of this ulterior motive too, and thought that, as long as his younger brother was cowed by fear of a siege, he might be restored to Alexandria

[1] I.e., Ptolemy VI Philometor; the younger was Euergetes II.

[9] potitus, relicto Memphi maiore Ptolemaeo, cui Fr: petitusrelic tutemplimatioremptolemeocum V.

a.u.c. 586

sorore adiuvante et non repugnantibus fratris amicis
3 ratus primum ad sororem, deinde ad fratrem [1] amicosque eius non prius destitit mittere, quam pacem
4 cum iis confirmaret. Suspectum Antiochum effecerat, quod cetera Aegypto sibi tradita Pelusi [2] validum
5 relictum erat praesidium. Apparebat claustra Aegypti teneri, ut, cum vellet,[3] rursus exercitum induceret; bello intestino cum fratre eum exitum fore, ut victor fessus certamine nequaquam par
6 Antiocho futurus esset. Haec prudenter animadversa a maiore cum adsensu minor frater quique cum eo erant acceperunt; soror plurimum adiuvit
7 non consilio modo, sed etiam precibus. Itaque consentientibus cunctis pace facta Alexandream recipitur, ne multitudine quidem adversante, quae in bello non per obsidionem modo, sed etiam postquam a moenibus abscessum est, quia nihil ex Aegypto subvehebatur, omnium rerum adtenuata inopia erat.
8 His cum laetari Antiochum conveniens esset, si reducendi [4] eius causa exercitum Aegyptum induxisset, quo specioso titulo ad omnis Asiae et Graeciae civitates legationibus recipiendis litterisque dimittendis usus erat, adeo est offensus ut multo acrius infestiusque adversus duos quam ante adversus unum
9 pararet bellum. Cyprum extemplo classem misit;

[1] fratrem Fr: patres V.
[2] Pelusi Fr: peculisi V.
[3] vellet J. P. Gronovius: velit V.
[4] esset, si reducendi Fr: essetiretiretducendi V.

---

[1] Who had proclaimed the younger brother king.
[2] Of 168 B.C.; he had made preparations in 171, XLII. xxix. 5; the first invasion was in 170, the reconciliation of the brothers presumably in 169 B.C. Polybius, on whom Livy based with the aid of his sister and without opposition on B.C. 168 the part of his brother's friends. He therefore kept sending, first to his sister, then to his brother and his friends, until he made an amicable settlement with them. Suspicion was directed against Antiochus because, though he had turned over the rest of Egypt to Ptolemy, he had left a strong garrison at Pelusium. It was evident that the key to Egypt was in Antiochus' hands, so that he could reinvade it when he wished. The upshot of a civil war between the brothers would be that the winner, worn out by the struggle, would be no match for Antiochus. This wise reasoning by the elder brother was gratefully accepted by the younger brother and his associates; the sister gave much assistance not only by her advice, but by her entreaties. Accordingly, peace was made by general agreement, and the elder Ptolemy returned to Alexandria, without opposition even on the part of the mob,[1] which had suffered throughout the war from a scarcity of all supplies not only during the siege, but after the enemy had left the walls, because nothing came in from Egypt.

It would have been in order for Antiochus to rejoice at this conclusion had he led his army into Egypt for the purpose of restoring Ptolemy—the specious plea that he had employed in statements to all the states of Asia and Greece either when he received embassies or sent out messages. But he was so incensed that he prepared for war against the two brothers with much more urgency and bitterness than against the one. He immediately sent a fleet to Cyprus; and in early spring [2] he himself advanced this account, records these events in XXVIII. 19–23; XXIX. 23 (8). 26–7 (7a, 11).

a.u.c. 586 ipse primo vere cum exercitu Aegyptum petens in 10 Coelen Syriam processit. Circa Rhinocolura [1] Ptolemaei legatis agentibus gratias, quod per eum regnum patrium recepisset, petentibusque ut suum munus tueretur et diceret potius quid fieri vellet quam hostis ex socio factus vi atque armis ageret, 11 respondit non aliter neque classem revocaturum neque exercitum reducturum, nisi sibi et tota Cypro et Pelusio agroque. qui circa Pelusiacum ostium Nili esset, cederetur,[2] diemque praestituit intra quam de condicionibus peractis responsum acciperet.

XII. Postquam dies data indutiis praeteriit, navigantibus ostio Nili [3] ad Pelusium praefectis ipse [4] per deserta Arabiae est profectus receptusque et ab
2 iis, qui [5] ad Memphim incolebant, et ab ceteris Aegyptiis, partim voluntate partim metu, ad Alex-
3 andream modicis itineribus descendit. Ad Eleusinem [6] transgresso flumen, qui locus quattuor milia ab Alexandrea abest, legati Romani occurrerunt.
4 Quos cum advenientis salutasset dextramque Popilio porrigeret, tabellas [7] ei Popilius senatus consultum [8] scriptum habentis tradit atque omnium primum id
5 legere iubet. Quibus perlectis cum se consideraturum adhibitis amicis quid faciendum sibi esset dixisset, Popilius pro cetera asperitate animi virga

[1] Rhinocolura Fr: rinocarala V.
[2] cederetur Bekker: cederet V.
[3] Nili Fr: nihil V.
[4] praefectis ipse add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[5] est profectus receptusque et ab iis, qui add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[6] Eleusinem Turnebus: leunsinem V.
[7] porrigeret, tabellas Fr: pollicereturabellas V.

with his army into Hollow Syria on his way to Egypt. B.C. 168
Near Rhinocolura envoys from Ptolemy met him, offering thanks for his assistance in recovering Ptolemy's ancestral throne and requesting that he should not undo his act of kindness and rather say what he wanted done than shift from ally to enemy and act by force of arms. Antiochus replied that he would recall his fleet and lead back his army on no other terms than the cession to him of all Cyprus, Pelusium, and the region which lies around the Pelusian mouth of the Nile. He also named a day before which he must receive the report of the execution of his terms.

XII. After the time allotted for the truce had expired, Antiochus' officers sailed to Pelusium via the mouth of the Nile, while he marched through the Arabian Desert and, after being received by the inhabitants of Memphis and the rest of the Egyptians, partly through good-will and partly through fear, he came down to Alexandria by short marches.[1] When he had crossed the river at Eleusis, a place four miles away from Alexandria, the Roman envoys met him. As they approached, he greeted them and offered his hand to Popilius; whereat Popilius handed him the tablets containing the decree of the senate in writing, and bade him read this first of all. On reading the decree, he said that he would call in his friends and consider what he should do; Popilius, in accordance with the usual harshness of his temper,

[1] Antiochus crowned himself king of Egypt, and issued coins in that capacity, see Naphtali Lewis, Classical Philology 44 (1949), pp. 32–3.

[8] senatus consultum add. Schweighauser : om. V.

A.U.C. 586

quam in manu gerebat circumscripsit regem ac "priusquam hoc circulo excedas" inquit "redde
6 responsum, senatui quod referam." Obstupefactus tam violento imperio parumper cum haesitasset, "faciam" inquit "quod censet senatus." Tum demum Popilius dextram[1] regi tamquam socio atque amico porrexit.

7 Die deinde finita cum excessisset Aegypto Antiochus, legati concordia etiam auctoritate sua inter fratres firmata, inter quos vixdum convenerat pax,[2] Cyprum navigant et inde, quae iam vicerat proelio
8 Aegyptias naves, classem Antiochi dimittunt. Clara ea per gentis legatio fuit, quod haud dubie adempta Antiocho Aegyptus habenti iam redditumque patrium regnum stirpi Ptolemaei fuerat.

9 Consulum eius anni sicut alterius clarus consulatus insigni victoria, ita alterius obscura fama, quia ma-
10 teriam res gerendi non habuit. Iam primum cum legionibus ad conveniendum diem edixit,[3] non auspicato templum intravit. Vitio diem[4] dictam esse augures, cum ad eos relatum esset,[5] decreverunt.
11 Profectus in Galliam circa Macros campos ad montis Siciminam et Papinum stativa habuit; deinde circa eadem loca cum sociis nominis Latini hibernabat;

[1] dextram Fr: senatum dextram V.
[2] pax I. Perizonius: pars V.
[3] diem edixit Luterbacher: dixit V.
[4] intravit. Vitio diem Fr: intui tiodiem V.
[5] esset Madvig: est V.

[1] According to Polybius XXIX. 27. 10, this victory of Antiochus' forces was on land.

drew a circle around the king with a rod that he B.C. 168 carried in his hand, and said, "Before you step out of this circle, give me an answer which I may take back to the senate." After the king had hesitated a moment, struck dumb by so violent an order, he replied, "I shall do what the senate decrees." Only then did Popilius extend his hand to the king as to an ally and friend.

Later, when Antiochus had quitted Egypt by the appointed day, and the envoys had also confirmed by their own weighty approval the agreement of the brothers, who with great difficulty had settled on terms of peace, the Romans sailed for Cyprus, whence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus which had already defeated the Egyptian ships in battle.[1] This embassy gained a great reputation among the nations, because Egypt had clearly been taken away from Antiochus after he had possession of it, and their ancestral kingdom had been restored to the House of Ptolemy.

The term of one of the consuls of this year was distinguished by a notable victory; the reputation of the other was correspondingly undistinguished, because he did not have the wherewithal for achievement. At the very outset, when he proclaimed a day for his legions to assemble, he entered the sacred enclosure [2] without taking the auspices. When the augurs were consulted on this matter, they declared that the day had been wrongfully set. The consul set out for Gaul, and had a fixed camp near Campi Macri [3] close to Mounts Sicimina and Papinus. Later he spent the winter in the same region with [2] Perhaps a special one laid out for this ceremony.

[3] Also mentioned above, XLI. xviii. 5–6.

A.U.C. 586

12 legiones Romanae, quod vitio dies exercitui ad conveniendum dicta erat, Romae manserant.

13 Et praetores praeter C. Papirium Carbonem, cui Sardinia evenerat, in provincias iere. Eum ius[1] dicere Romae—nam eam quoque sortem habebat—inter cives et peregrinos patres censuerant.

XIII. Et Popilius et ea legatio, quae missa ad Antiochum erat, Romam redit; rettulit controversias inter reges sublatas esse exercitumque ex Aegypto 2 in Syriam reductum. Post ipsorum regum legati venerunt; Antiochi legati referentes omni victoria potiorem pacem regi, senatui quae placuisset, visam,[2] eumque haud secus quam deorum imperio legatorum Romanorum iussis paruisse; gratulati[3] dein de 3 victoria sunt, quam ope sua,[4] si quid imperatum foret, adiuturum[5] regem fuisse.

4 Ptolemaei legati communi nomine regis et Cleo- 5 patrae gratias egerunt; plus eos senatui populoque Romano quam parentibus suis, plus quam diis immortalibus debere, per quos obsidione miserrima liberati essent, regnum patrium prope amissum recepissent.

[1] eum ius Fr: eumdumius V.

[2] victoria potiorem pacem regi, senatui quae placuisset, visam Bekker: victoriā potiorempaceregisenatuiqueplacuissetvisa V.

[3] gratulati Kreyssig: legati V.

[4] sua add. Madvig: om. V.

[5] adiuturum Kreyssig: adfuturum V.

---

[1] Anicius, the commander in Illyricum, had first been assigned as praetor peregrinus. The praetor for Sardinia was often assigned to special tasks (cf. XXXIX. xxxviii. 3;

the allies of the Latin Name; the Roman legions had B.C. 168 remained at Rome, because the day for the assembly of the army was wrongfully appointed.

The praetors also went to their provinces, except Gaius Papirius Carbo, to whom Sardinia had fallen. The senate decreed that he should conduct at Rome the court for suits between citizens and aliens, for this also had been allotted to him.[1]

XIII. Popilius, too, and the embassy which had been sent to Antiochus returned to Rome. They reported that the disputes between the kings had been settled and the army led out of Egypt into Syria. Afterwards the envoys of the kings themselves arrived. Antiochus' envoys reported that to the king peace had seemed preferable to any conquest, since it was the wish of the senate, and that Antiochus had obeyed the orders of the Roman envoys as if they had been gods. Then they presented congratulations on the victory, to which the king would have contributed his aid, they said, if any demand had been made upon him.

Ptolemy's envoys[2] offered thanks in the names of the king and Cleopatra together; they owed, they said, more to the Roman senate and people than to their own parents, more than to the immortal gods, since they had been freed by the Romans from a most wretched state of siege, and had recovered the ancestral kingdom which they had almost lost.

XL. xxxvii. 4; xliii. 2), while his predecessor, in this case P. Fonteius Capito (cf. XLIII. xv. 3), continued in office; see also below, xvi. 4.

[2] The embassy was from both Ptolemies, according to Polybius XXX. 16.

A.U.C. 586

6 Responsum [1] ab senatu est Antiochum recte atque ordine fecisse, quod legatis paruisset, gratumque id
7 esse senatui populoque Romano: regibus Aegypti, Ptolemaeo Cleopatraeque, si quid per se boni commodique evenisset, id magno opere senatum laetari, daturumque operam, ut regni sui maximum semper praesidium positum esse in fide populi Romani ducant.
8 Munera legatis ut ex instituto mittenda curaret, C.
9 Papirio praetori mandatum. Litterae deinde e [2] Macedonia allatae, quae victoriae laetitiam geminarent: Persea regem in potestatem consulis venisse.
10 Dimissis legatis regiis [3] disceptatum inter Pisanos Lunensesque legatos est.[4] Pisanis querentibus agro se a colonis Romanis pelli, Lunensibus adfirmantibus eum, de quo agatur, ab triumviris [5] agrum sibi adsi-11 gnatum esse. Senatus, qui de finibus cognoscerent statuerentque, quinque viros misit Q. Fabium Buteonem, P. Cornelium Blasionem, T. Sempronium Muscam, L. Naevium Balbum, C. Apuleium Saturninum.
12 Et ab Eumene et ab Attalo et ab Athenaeo fratribus communis legatio de victoria gratulatum venit. Et Masgabae, regis Masinissae filio, Puteolis nave egresso praesto fuit obviam missus cum pecunia L. Manlius quaestor, qui Romam eum publico sumptu

[1] recepissent. Responsum add. Fr: om. V.
[2] e add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[3] regiis add. Heraeus: om. V.
[4] est Vahlen: et V.
[5] triumviris Kreyssig: utrumviris V.

[1] The colony at Luna was established in 177 B.C., see XLI. xiii. 5. Luna at this time was reckoned as belonging to Cisalpine Gaul, the boundary of Italy proper running between it and Pisa; in earlier times it had been Etruscan.

The senate's reply to Antiochus was that he had done what was right and proper in obeying the envoys, and that the Roman senate and people were pleased. To the king and queen of Egypt, Ptolemy and Cleopatra, the reply was that the senate was very happy if by its agency something good and beneficial had come to pass, and that the senate would use its best efforts to convince them that the greatest bulwark of their reign was founded on the good faith of the Roman people. Instructions were given to Gaius Papirius the praetor that he should see that the customary presents were sent to the envoys. Despatches from Macedonia were then introduced, calculated to redouble the rejoicing over the victory; they reported that King Perseus was a prisoner of the consul. B.C. 168

After the royal embassies were dismissed, a dispute was heard between envoys from Pisa and from Luna.[1] The Pisans complained that Roman colonists were driving them off their land, whereas the men of Luna declared that the land in question had been assigned to them by the board of three. The senate sent five men to investigate the facts about the boundary and make a decision, namely, Quintus Fabius Buteo, Publius Cornelius Blasio, Titus Sempronius Musca, Lucius Naevius Balbus, and Gaius Apuleius Saturninus.

From the brothers Eumenes, Attalus, and Athenaeus a joint embassy of congratulation on the victory arrived.[2] When Masgaba, too, the son of King Masinissa, landed from his ship at Puteoli, he was met by Lucius Manlius the quaestor who had been sent with money to meet him, to escort him at [2] Perhaps the same as the embassy mentioned below, xix.

A.U.C. 586

13 perduceret. Advenienti extemplo senatus datus est. Ibi [1] adulescens ita locutus est ut quae rebus grata erant gratiora verbis faceret. Commemoravit, quot pedites equitesque, quot elephantos, quantum frumenti eo quadriennio pater suus in Macedoniam
14 misisset; [2] duas res ei rubori fuisse, unam, quod rogasset eum per legatos senatus, quae ad bellum opus essent,[3] et non imperasset, alteram, quod
15 pecuniam ei pro frumento misisset. Masinissam meminisse se [4] regnum a populo Romano partum auctumque et multiplicatum habere; usu regni contentum scire dominium et ius eorum, qui dederint, 16 esse. Sumere itaque eos de se,[5] non rogare aequom esse. neque emere ea ex fructibus agri ab se dati quae ibi proveniant. Id Masinissae satis esse et 17 fore, quod populo Romano superesset. Cum iis mandatis a patre profectum postea consecutos equites, qui devictam Macedoniam nuntiarent gratularique [6] senatui iuberent et indicare ita eam [7] rem laetitiae patri suo esse, ut Romam venire velit Iovique optimo maximo in Capitolio sacrificare et grates agere; id, nisi molestum sit, ut ei permittatur, ab senatu petere.

XIV. Responsum regulo est facere patrem eius Masinissam, quod virum gratum bonumque facere

[1] ibi Weissenborn: is V.
[2] misisset Madvig: misitsed V.
[3] essent Gruter: esset V.
[4] se add. Drakenborch: om. V.
[5] eos de se Madvig: eosdemse V.
[6] gratularique Harant: gratulatumque V.
[7] indicare ita eam Harant: indicarenttaceam V.

public expense to Rome. On Masgaba's arrival, a B.C. 168 meeting of the senate was at once held for him. There the young man spoke so as to make matters pleasing by their nature even more pleasing by his words. He recalled how much infantry and cavalry, how many elephants, and how much grain his father had sent to Macedonia during those four years. He said that there were two matters which brought a blush to his father's cheeks: first, that the senate had requested through envoys what they needed for the war, and had not ordered it, and secondly, that they had sent him money for the grain. Masinissa remembered, said his son, that he held a kingdom won by the Roman People, and that they had increased it and made it many times as great; he was satisfied with the usufruct of the kingdom, and knew that the ownership and title to it were vested in those who had given it. Therefore it was right that they should claim what they wished from him, not request it, nor buy the products of his country that sprang from a soil that was their own gift. Masinissa was and would be satisfied with what the Roman People did not need. After Masgaba had set out with this message, he said, horsemen had overtaken him to report that Macedonia had been conquered and to bid him congratulate the senate and point out to them that his father was so rejoiced over this event that he wished to come to Rome and offer sacrifice and thanksgiving to Jupiter, Greatest and Best, on the Capitol; he requested permission from the senate to do this, if they had no objection.

XIV. The answer was given to the prince that his father Masinissa was acting as was proper for a good and grateful man, in that he attached to payment due

A.U.C. 586

deceat, ut pretium honoremque debito beneficio
2 addat. Et populum Romanum ab eo bello Punico forti fidelique opera adiutum, et illum favente populo Romano regnum adeptum; aequatis[1] iis postea trium regum bellis deinceps omnibus eum functum
3 officiis. Victoria vero populi Romani laetari eum regem mirum non esse, qui sortem omnem fortunae regnique sui cum rebus Romanis miscuisset.[2] Grates deis pro[3] victoria apud suos penates ageret; Romae
4 filium pro eo acturum. Gratulatum quoque satis suo ac patris nomine esse. Ipsum relinquere regnum et Africa excedere, praeterquam quod illi inutile esset, non esse e re publica populi Romani senatum censere.
5 Petenti Masgabae, ut Hanno, Hamilcaris filius, obses[4] in locum . . . exigeretur, responsum est haud aequum videri senatum a Carthaginiensibus
6 obsides arbitrio Masinissae[5] exigere. Munera ex senatus consulto emere regulo quaestor iussus ex centum pondo argenti et prosequi eum Puteolos omnemque sumptum, quoad in Italia esset, praebere et duas naves conducere, quibus ipse comitesque eius[6] in Africam deveherentur; et comitibus omni-
7 bus, liberis servisque, vestimenta data.
8 Haud ita multo post de altero Masinissae filio Misagene litterae adlatae sunt, missum eum ab L. Paulo post devictum Persea in Africam cum equitibus

[1] aequatis Weissenborn: aequitatis V.
[2] miscuisset Kreyssig: immiscuisset V.
[3] pro Madvig: pr. V.
[4] obses Sigonius: ospes V.
[5] exigeretur, responsum est haud aequum videri senatum a Carthaginiensibus obsides arbitrio Masinissae add. Zingerle: om. V: nomen obsidis deest.
[6] eius J. F. Gronovius: regis V.

for kindness such credit and honour. On the one hand B.C. 168 the Roman People had profited by his brave and loyal aid in the Punic War, and on the other, he had secured his kingdom through the good will of the Roman People; after this balancing of favours, he had performed every possible act of friendship in wars against three kings successively. Joy over the victory of the Roman People was not surprising in a king who had linked with the fortunes of the Romans the whole hazard of his personal fortunes and those of his realm. As for thanks to the gods for the victory, let him offer them in his own home; his son would serve as his representative at Rome. The son had also offered sufficient congratulations on his own and his father's behalf. That Masinissa himself should leave his kingdom and go outside of Africa, apart from the fact that it was against his own interests, was also contrary to the public welfare of the Roman People, the senate believed.

When Masgaba requested that Hanno, son of Hamilcar, be demanded as hostage in place of . . ., the answer was given that the senate considered it by no means just to exact hostages from the Carthaginians according to the judgment of Masinissa. The quaestor was ordered to buy gifts for the prince, in accordance with a resolution of the senate, to the amount of one hundred pounds of silver, and to escort him to Puteoli, to provide for all his expenses while he was in Italy, and to hire two ships to convey him and his suite to Africa. Garments were presented to all his suite, both free and slave.

Not very much later dispatches were brought from Masinissa's other son Misagenes, stating that he had been sent with his cavalry to Africa by Lucius Paulus

A.U.C. 586

suis; navigantem dispersa classe in Hadriatico mari
9 Brundisium tribus navibus aegrum delatum. Ad[1] eum cum isdem muneribus, quae data Romae fratri eius erant, L. Stertinius quaestor Brundisium missus iussusque[2] curare, ut aedes hospitio . . .[3]

XV. In quattuor urbanas tribus discripti[4] erant libertini praeter eos, quibus filius quinquenni maior
2 ex se natus[5] esset,—eos, ubi proximo lustro censi essent, censeri iusserunt—et eos, qui praedium praediave rustica pluris sestertium triginta milium
3 haberent, . . .[6] censendi ius factum est. Hoc cum ita servatum esset, negabat Claudius suffragii lationem iniussu populi censorem cuiquam homini,
4 nedum ordini universo adimere posse. Neque enim, si tribu movere possit,[7] quod sit nihil aliud quam mutare iubere tribum, ideo omnibus quinque et triginta tribubus emovere posse, id est civitatem libertatemque eripere, non, ubi censeatur, finire,
5 sed censu excludere. Haec inter ipsos disceptata; postremo eo descensum est, ut ex quattuor urbanis

[1] ad add. Fr: om. V.
[2] iussus add. Fr: om. V.
[3] hospi V: lacuna folii unius.
[4] discripti Buecheler: descripti V.
[5] ex se natus Kreyssig: exsenatu V.
[6] lacunam indicat Crévier.
[7] possit Drakenborch: posset V.

---

[1] From Valerius Maximus V. 1. 1d, the following matters seem to have been recounted here: the quaestor was to provide for the care of Misagenes, furnish expense-money for him and his suite, and provide ships for the voyage to Africa; also a pound of silver and 500 sesterces apiece were to be given to each cavalryman; Misagenes died. Presumably also the report of the elections, and something about the activity of

after the defeat of Perseus, that on his voyage his fleet had been scattered in the Adriatic, and he had arrived in ill heath with three ships at Brundisium. Lucius Stertinius the quaestor was sent to him with the same gifts which had been given at Rome to his brother, and was instructed to see to it that a house for entertainment . . .[1] B.C. 168

XV. Freedmen had been distributed among the four city tribes except for those who had a son over five years old (these they ordered to be reckoned where they had been enrolled at the census immediately previous), and those who had an estate or estates in the country valued at over thirty thousand sesterces . . .[2] the privilege of enrolling was granted. Although this arrangement had become established in this way, Claudius said that it was impossible for a censor without a decree of the people to deprive any individual of his ballot, let alone a whole class. For if, said Claudius, the censor could move a man from his tribe, which was exactly what ordering him to change his tribe meant, he could remove him from all thirty-five tribes, that is, deprive him of citizenship and status as a free man—not determine where he should be enrolled but exclude him from enrolment.[3] This was argued between the two censors; finally they resorted to the following solution: they drew lots publicly in the Hall of the censors, prefatory to the following chapter, was included here. Previous activity of the censors was reported in XLIII. xiv–xvi; XLIV. xvi. 8–10. Cf. also the Summary of this book.

[2] The lacuna may have contained mention of the country tribes, in which the freedmen with large holdings were allowed.

[3] Claudius appears to be indulging in hyperbole, since the private rights of a free citizen were not in question, tribubus unam palam in atrio Libertatis sortirentur, in quam omnes, qui servitutem servissent, conicerent. 6 Esquilinae sors exiit; in ea Ti. Gracchus pronuntiavit libertinos omnis censeri placere. 7 Magno ea res honori censoribus apud senatum fuit. Gratiae actae et Sempronio, qui in bene coepto perseverasset, et Claudio, qui non impedisset. 8 Plures quam ab [1] superioribus et senatu moti [2] sunt et equos vendere iussi. Omnes iidem ab utroque et tribu moti [3] et aerarii facti: neque ullius, quem alter 9 notarat,[4] ab [5] altero levata ignominia. Petentibus, ut ex instituto ad sarta tecta exigenda et ad opera quae locassent probanda anni et sex mensum [6] tempus prorogaretur, Cn. Tremellius tribunus, quia lectus non erat in senatum, intercessit.

A.U.C. 586

10 Eodem anno C. Cicereius aedem Monetae in monte [7] Albano dedicavit quinquennio post quam vovit. Flamen Martialis inauguratus est eo anno L. Postumius Albinus.

XVI. Q. Aelio M. Iunio consulibus de provinciis referentibus censuere patres duas provincias Hispaniam

[1] plures quam ab Kreyssig: plusquamad V.
[2] moti Douiatius: remoti V.
[3] moti J. F. Gronovius: remoti V.
[4] notarat Pighius: notaret V.
[5] ab add. Fr: om. V.
[6] sex mensum Bekker: bimensus V.
[7] aedem Monetae in monte Drakenborch: ademmõ et V.

[1] Previous instances of severity on the part of these censors are recorded in XLIII. xv. 6; xvi. 1; XLIV. xvi. 8.

[2] His vow is recorded in XLII. vii. 1; his triumph, on the Alban Mount, in XLII. xxi. 7. Dio Cassius XXXIX. 20, records as a portent that "a small temple of Juno, on a certain table, facing the east, was turned to the north." Perhaps the curious mention of a table (trapeza) is an error due to the Liberty for one of the four city tribes, to which they B.C. 16 would consign all those who had been slaves. The lot of the Esquiline tribe was cast; Tiberius Gracchus announced that they had decided to enrol all freedmen in this tribe.

This matter was regarded by the senate as greatly to the credit of the censors. Thanks were voted to Sempronius, for having persisted in a praiseworthy undertaking, and to Claudius, for not interfering. More men were removed from the senate than by former censors, and more also ordered to sell their horses.[1] All alike were by both censors removed from their tribe and made aerarii; nor was the disgrace of anyone who had been blacklisted by the one relieved by the other. When the censors asked that their term be prolonged to a year and a half in order that they might, as was customary, see to repairs to buildings and inspect the public works for which they had contracted, the request was vetoed by the tribune Gnaeus Tremellius, because he had not been chosen for the senate.

In this same year Gaius Cicereius dedicated a temple to Moneta on the Alban Mount five years after he vowed it.[2] In this year Lucius Postumius Albinus was consecrated as flamen of Mars.[3]

XVI. When the new consuls Quintus Aelius and Marcus Junius[4] put to the senate the question of provinces, the Fathers voted that Spain should again association of Juno Moneta with monetary matters, cf. the monetary associations of trapeza.

[3] The death of the previous flamen is recorded in XLIV. xviii. 7.

[4] Both these consuls were plebeians, as in 172 B.C., XLII. x. 9. 172 was the first year in which two plebeians were elected, according to the Fasti Capitolini, C.I.L.[2] I. i., p. 25.

A.U.C. 587

rursus fieri, quae una per bellum Macedonicum fuerat;
2 et Macedoniam Illyricumque eosdem, L. Paulum et L. Anicium, obtinere, donec de sententia legatorum res et bello turbatas et in [1] statum alium ex regno
3 formandas composuissent. Consulibus Pisae et Gallia decretae cum binis legionibus quinum milium et ducenorum [2] peditum et equitum quadringenorum.[3] Praetorum sortes fuere. Q. Cassi urbana, M'. Iuventi Thalnae [4] inter peregrinos, Ti. Claudi Neronis Sicilia,
4 Cn. Fulvi Hispania citerior, ulterior [5] C. Licini Nervae. A. Manlio Torquato Sardinia obvenerat: at [6] nequiit ire in provinciam, ad res capitalis quaerendas ex senatus consulto retentus.
5 De prodigiis deinde nuntiatis senatus est consultus. Aedes deum [7] Penatium in Velia de caelo tacta erat et in oppido Minervio duae portae et muri aliquantum. Anagniae terra pluerat et Lanuvi fax in caelo visa erat; et Calatiae in publico agro M. Valerius civis Romanus nuntiabat e foco suo sangui-
6 nem [8] per triduum et duas noctes manasse. Ob id maxime decemviri libros adire iussi supplicationem

[1] in add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[2] legionibus quinum milium et ducenorum add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[3] quadringenorum Drakenborch: quadringentorum V.
[4] urbana, M'. Iuventi Thalnae Sigonius: urbanamiuuentitalnae V.
[5] ulterior add. Fr, Hertz: om. V.
[6] at add. Novák: om. V.
[7] deum Kreyssig: deus V.
[8] sanguinem Gruter: xanguine V.

---

[1] The number sounds like the allied cavalry; a reference to Roman cavalry and allied infantry may have been lost. The usual number of Roman cavalry is 300, see XXII. xxxvi. 3;

be made two provinces, after having been one during the Macedonian War; also that the same officers, Lucius Paulus and Lucius Anicius, should command in Macedonia and Illyricum until on the advice of senatorial envoys they had made a settlement for these states which had been upset by war, and which were to be given a constitution other than monarchical. To the consuls Pisa and Gaul were assigned with two legions apiece, each legion to be composed of five thousand two hundred infantry and four hundred cavalry.[1] The assignments for the praetors were: to Quintus Cassius, the City Praetorship; to Manius Juventius Thalna, the jurisdiction over aliens; to Tiberius Claudius Nero, Sicily; to Gnaeus Fulvius, Hither Spain; to Gaius Licinius Nerva, Farther Spain. Aulus Manlius Torquatus was assigned Sardinia, but was unable to go to his province, since he was held by vote of the senate to preside over trials for capital crimes.[2] B.C. 167

The question of the prodigies which had been reported was next put to the senate. The temple of the Household Gods on the Velia had been struck by lightning, as well as two gates and a section of wall in the town of Minervium. At Anagnia there had been a rain of earth and at Lanuvium a meteor had been seen in the sky; and at Calatia on state-owned land Marcus Valerius, a Roman citizen, reported that blood had trickled from his hearth for three days and two nights. Especially for this last the Board of Ten was ordered to consult the books; they but the number 400 also appears in XXIII. xxxiv. 13 and XL. xxxvi. 8.

[2] Again the new praetor did not go to Sardinia, see above, p. 284, note 1. For similar special inquiries into crime, cf. XL. xliii. 2; XXXIX. xxxviii. 3; xli. 5.

A.U.C. 587

in diem unum populo edixerunt et quinquaginta capris in foro sacrificaverunt. Et aliorum prodigiorum causa diem alterum supplicatio circa omnia pulvinaria fuit et hostiis maioribus sacrificatum est et urbs lustrata.

7 Item,[1] quod ad honorem deum immortalium pertineret, decrevit senatus ut quoniam perduelles superati Perseus et Gentius reges cum Macedonia atque Illyrico in potestate populi Romani essent, 8 ut, quanta dona Ap. Claudio M. Sempronio consulibus ob devictum Antiochum regem data ad omnia pulvinaria essent, tanta Q. Cassius et M'. Iuventius praetores curarent danda.

XVII. Legatos deinde, quorum de sententia imperatores L. Paulus, L. Anicius componerent res, decreverunt decem in Macedoniam, quinque in[2]
2 Illyricum. In Macedoniam primi[3] nominati: A. Postumius Luscus, C. Claudius, ambo illi[4] censorii, Q. Fabius Labeo, Q. Marcius Philippus,[5] C. Licinius Crassus, collega in consulatu Pauli, tum prorogato
3 imperio provinciam Galliam habebat. His consularibus addidere Cn. Domitium Ahenobarbum, Ser. Cornelium Sullam, L. Iunium, T. Numisium Tarqui-
4 niensem, A. Terentium Varronem. In[6] Illyricum autem hi nominati: P. Aelius Ligus consularis, C. Cicereius et Cn. Baebius Tamphilus—hic priore anno,

[1] item Madvig: idem V.
[2] in add. Fr: om. V.
[3] primi Vahlen: culpmi V.
[4] illi Hertz: alii V.
[5] Q. Fabius Labeo, Q. Marcius Philippus add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[6] in add. Fr: om. V.

proclaimed to the people a single day of prayer and B.C. 167 offered a sacrifice of fifty goats in the forum. Because of the other prodigies, another day of prayer was observed at all the banquet-tables of the gods, sacrifice with greater victims was offered, and the city purified.

Another matter concerning the paying of respects to the immortal gods was the senate's decree that, whereas the enemy had been conquered and the kings Perseus and Gentius along with Macedonia and Illyricum were under the sway of the Roman People, therefore the praetors Quintus Cassius and Manius Juventius should see to the presentation at all the banquet-tables of the gods of gifts as great as those given in the consulship of Appius Claudius and Marcus Sempronius because of the victory over King Antiochus.[1]

XVII. Ten commissioners for Macedonia and five for Illyricum were then appointed, on whose advice Lucius Paulus and Lucius Anicius might arrange the settlements. First those for Macedonia were named: Aulus Postumius Luscus and Gaius Claudius, both ex-censors, Quintus Fabius Labeo, Quintus Marcius Philippus, and Gaius Licinius Crassus, who was Paulus' colleague in the consulship and at that time was in charge of Gaul, his term of command having been extended. To these ex-consuls were added Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus, Servius Cornelius Sulla, Lucius Junius, Titus Numisius Tarquiniensis, and Aulus Terentius Varro. For Illyricum the following were named: Publius Aelius Ligus, an ex-consul, Gaius Cicereius and Gnaeus Baebius Tam-

[1] These are mentioned in XXXVI. ii. 2–5; the consuls served in 185 B.C.

A.U.C. 587

Cicereius multis ante annis praetor fuerat—, P. Terentius Tuscivicanus, P. Manilius.

5 Moniti deinde consules a patribus ut, quoniam alterum ex his succedere C. Licinio, qui legatus nominatus erat, in Gallia oporteret, primo quoque [1] tempore provincias aut compararent inter se aut 6 sortirentur. sortiti sunt. M. Iunio Pisae obvenerunt, quem, priusquam in provinciam iret, legationes quae undique Romam gratulatum convenerant introducere 7 in senatum placuit, Q. Aelio Gallia.[2] Ceterum quamquam tales viri mitterentur, quorum de consilio sperari posset imperatores nihil indignum nec clementia nec gravitate populi Romani decreturos esse, tamen in senatu quoque agitata [3] sunt summa consiliorum, ut inchoata omnia legati ab domo ferre ad imperatores possent.

XVIII. Omnium primum liberos esse placebat Macedonas atque Illyrios, ut omnibus gentibus appareret arma populi Romani non liberis servitutem, sed contra 2 servientibus libertatem adferre, ut et, in libertate gentes quae essent, tutam eam sibi perpetuamque sub tutela populi Romani [4] esse, et, quae sub regibus viverent, et in praesens tempus mitiores eos iustioresque respectu populi Romani habere se crederent et,[5] si quando bellum cum populo Romano regibus fuisset suis, exitum eius victoriam Romanis adlaturum,

[1] quoque add. Fr : om. V.
[2] Gallia add. Fr : om. V.
[3] agitata Weissenborn : agitaltes V.
[4] populi Romani add. Sigonius : om. V.
[5] et Madvig : eo V.

[1] Five years before, see above, xv. 9.

philus (the latter had been praetor the previous year, B.C. 167 the former many years before [1]), Publius Terentius Tuscivicanus, and Publius Manilius.

Next the consuls were instructed by the Fathers that, since one of them should relieve Gaius Licinius, who had been appointed commissioner, in Gaul, they ought as early as possible either to agree on their provinces or to draw lots. They accordingly drew lots. Pisa fell to Marcus Junius, Gaul to Quintus Aelius. The senate voted that before Junius went to his field of activity, he should present to the senate the embassies which had assembled in Rome from all quarters to offer congratulations. Moreover, although men were being sent of sufficient calibre to justify the hope that by their advice the generals would establish nothing unworthy of either the mercy or the high position of the Roman People, yet discussions went on in the senate too as to general considerations, so that the commissioners might carry from home to the generals a full outline of policy.

XVIII. First of all it was voted that the Macedonians and Illyrians should be given their independence, so that it should be clear to all nations that the forces of the Roman People brought not slavery to free peoples, but on the contrary, freedom to the enslaved. The senate wished nations which were free to consider that their freedom was assured and lasting under the protection of the Roman People, and that those who lived under kings should feel for the time being that their rulers were milder and more just under the eye of the Roman People, and, if at any time their kings should make war on the Roman People, that the outcome of the war would bring victory to the Romans, but freedom to

A.U.C. 587

3 sibi libertatem.[1] Metalli quoque Macedonici, quod ingens vectigal erat, locationes praediorumque
4 rusticorum tolli placebat; nam neque sine publicano exerceri posse et, ubi publicanus esset, ibi aut ius publicum vanum aut libertatem sociis nullam esse.
5 Ne ipsos quidem Macedonas id[2] exercere posse; ubi in medio praeda administrantibus esset, ibi numquam causas seditionum et certaminis defore.
6 Denique ne, si[3] commune concilium[4] gentis esset, improbus vulgi adsentator[5] aliquando libertatem salubri moderatione[6] datam ad licentiam pestilentam
7 traheret, in quattuor regiones discribi[7] Macedoniam, ut suum quaeque concilium[8] haberet, placuit et dimidium tributi, quam quod regibus ferre soliti erant, populo Romano pendere. Similia his et in[9]
8 Illyricum mandata. Cetera ipsis imperatoribus legatisque relicta, in quibus praesens tractatio rerum certiora subiectura erat consilia.

XIX. Inter multas regum gentiumque et populorum legationes Attalus, frater regis Eumenis, maxime convertit in se omnium oculos animosque.

[1] fuisset suis, exitum eius victoriam Romanis adlaturum, sibi libertatem Madvig: fuisse sieuisexitumeiusuictoriamuic romanisadlaturumcrederent sibiadlaturumsibilibertatem V.
[2] id Crévier: idem V.
[3] denique ne si add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[4] concilium Sigonius: consilum V.
[5] improbus vulgi adsentator Hartel: improbumuulgiadsenator V.
[6] moderatione Doviatius: moderationi V.
[7] discribi Buecheler: describi V.
[8] concilium Sigonius: consilium V.
[9] in add. Fr: om. V.

themselves. It was also voted to discontinue the B.C. 167 leasing of the Macedonian mines, a source of immense revenue, and of rural estates, for these could not be farmed without a contractor, and where there was a contractor, there either the ownership by the state lapsed, or no freedom was left to the allied people.[1] It was impossible, the senate thought, for even the Macedonians to farm these resources; for where there was booty as a prize for administrators, in that state there would never be a lack of reasons for conspiracies and strife. Finally, fearing that if there were a common legislature for the nation, some relentless demagogue would turn the freedom given in healthy moderation into the licence which brings ruin, the senate voted to divide Macedonia into four sections, so that each might have its own legislature. It was further resolved that Macedonia should pay to the Roman People half the taxes which they had been accustomed to pay to their kings. Like instructions were given for Illyricum. The details were left to the generals and the commissioners themselves, for which the present discussion would lay a surer foundation of planning.[2]

XIX. Among the many embassies from kings, nations, and peoples Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, especially drew to himself the eyes and

[1] The reasoning is perhaps that of Cato, who favoured Macedonian "freedom," see Spartianus, Hadrian 5; for the attitude toward the financiers, cf. XXXII. xxvii. 4; XXXIX. xliv. 8–9; XLIII. xvi. Below, xxix. 11, the specific arrangement for the mines is mentioned: gold and silver mining was prohibited, but iron and copper might be worked. The estates were no doubt those of the king.

[2] From xii. 9 to this point, Livy seems to have followed Roman annalists; he now draws from Polybius XXX. 1–5.

A.U.C. 587

2 Exceptus enim est ab iis,[1] qui simul eo bello militaverant[2] haud paulo benignius quam si ipse rex
3 Eumenes venisset. Adduxerant eum duae in speciem honestae res, una gratulatio conveniens in ea victoria quam ipse adiuvisset, altera querimonia Gallici tumultus acceptaeque cladis qua[3] regnum in 4 dubium adductum esset. Suberat et secreta spes honorum praemiorumque ab senatu, quae vix salva pietate ei[4] contingere poterant. Erant[5] enim quidam Romanorum quoque non boni auctores, qui spe
5 cupiditatem eius elicerent; eam opinionem de Attalo et Eumene Romae esse, tamquam de altero Romanis certo amico, altero nec Romanis nec Persei fido
6 socio. Itaque vix statui posse utrum quae pro se an quae contra fratrem petiturus esset ab senatu magis impetrabilia forent: adeo universos omnia et huic tribuere et illi vero negare.

7 Eorum hominum, ut res docuit, Attalus erat qui, quantum spes spopondisset, cuperent, ni unius amici prudens monitio velut frenos animo eius gestienti
8 secundis rebus imposuisset. Stratius cum eo fuit medicus, ad id ipsum a non securo Eumene Romam missus speculator rerum, quae a fratre agerentur, 9 monitorque fidus, si decidi fide vidisset. Is ad occupatas iam aures solicitatumque iam animum cum

[1] iis Kreyssig: his V.
[2] militaverant Clericus: militaverunt V.
[3] acceptaeque cladis qua Walch, Kreyssig: aduertaequegladiisquae V.
[4] ei Crévier: eius V.
[5] erant add. Fr: om. V.

minds of everyone.[1] For he was received by those who had served with him in this war in much more cordial fashion than if King Eumenes himself had come. Two reasons honourable in outward view brought him to Rome, first the congratulations suitable to the recent victory in which he himself had aided, and second, complaint about the uprising of the Galatians and the disaster suffered thereby, which threatened destruction to the kingdom itself. Underneath he cherished a secret hope of honours and rewards from the senate which he could hardly accept without disloyalty to his brother. For there were also certain untrustworthy Roman advisers to stimulate his self-seeking with hope; the view, they said, held in Rome about Attalus and Eumenes was that the former was a sure friend to the Romans, while the latter was a faithful ally neither to the Romans nor to Perseus; accordingly it could hardly be determined whether the senate would be more disposed to grant his requests for himself or those against his brother—to such an extent did one and all make every concession to the one, but withhold any from the other. B.C. 167

Attalus was, as the facts showed, one of those men who would desire whatever hope might promise; but the wise advice of one friend tightened the reins, as it were, on his spirit elated by success. Stratius, a physician, was with him, sent to Rome by the uneasy Eumenes precisely to keep an eye on the actions of his brother and to give loyal advice, if he saw any failure in loyalty. This Stratius made his approach to ears already filled and a mind already temp-

[1] According to Polybius, the warmth of this reception suggested to Attalus the possibility of supplanting his brother.

u.c. 587 venisset, adgressus tempestivis sermonibus[1] rem prope prolapsam restituit, aliis alia regna crevisse 10 rebus dicendo: regnum eorum novum, nullis vetustis fundatum opibus, fraterna stare concordia, quod unus nomen regium et praecipuum capitis insigne gerat,
11 omnes fratres regnent. Attalum vero, qui aetate proximus sit,[2] quis non pro rege habeat? neque eo solum, quia tantas praesentes eius opes cernat, sed quod haud ambiguum sit[3] prope diem regnaturum; eam infirmitatem aetatemque Eumenis esse nullam stirpem liberum habentis: necdum enim agnoverat
12 eum, qui postea regnavit. Quid attinere[4] vim adferre rei sua sponte ad eum mox venturae?[5] accessisse etiam novam tempestatem regno tumultus Gallici, cui vix consensu et concordia regum
13 resisti queat: si vero ad externum bellum domestica seditio adiciatur, sisti non posse. Nec aliud eum quam, ne frater in regno moriatur, sibi ipsi spem
14 propinquam regni erepturum. Si utraque gloriosa res esset, et servasse fratri regnum et eripuisse, servati tamen regni, quae iuncta pietati sit, potiorem laudem futuram[6] fuisse. Sed enimvero cum detesta-

[1] sermonibus J. F. Gronovius: temporibus V.
[2] qui aetate proximus sit Kreyssig: quiaaetaterproximussi V.
[3] sit add. Harant: om. V.
[4] attinere J. F. Gronovius: adtineret V.
[5] venturae Duker: adventurae V.
[6] futuram add. Andresen: om. V.

---

[1] Eumenes was in his late fifties at this time.
[2] This successor, Attalus III, was born shortly before Eumenes' death, and reigned for 21 years under a regency of his uncle Attalus. (See XLII. xvi. 9 and the note, Vol. XII, p. 339, for the view that Attalus III was actually the son of ted, and by offering well-timed remarks won an almost B.C. 167 lost cause; his argument was that different kingdoms had thrived on different things; the kingdom of Pergamum, being new and not bolstered by any long-standing wealth, was founded on brotherly harmony, because one brother wore the name of king and the distinguishing emblem on his head, but all the brothers ruled. As for Attalus, who was second in age, who did not consider him as a king? And not only because one could see that his present powers were so great, but because it was beyond doubt that he would reign before many days had passed, for the weakness and age [1] of Eumenes pointed in that direction, since he was at that time without issue (for Eumenes had not at that time acknowledged the son who reigned after him [2]). What use was there, said Stratius, in seeking by violence a prize which would automatically fall to him shortly? Furthermore, the kingdom had been assailed by the fresh tempest of the Galatian uprising, which could hardly be withstood by agreement and harmony in the royal family; but if civil strife were added to the foreign war, no halt could be called. What he was considering was simply preventing his brother from dying as king in order to rob himself of his imminent expectation of the throne. Even if it were true that either action would bring fame, whether he preserved the kingdom for his brother, or snatched it from him, nevertheless praise for preserving the kingdom, coupled as it was with family loyalty, would still be the better choice. But inasmuch as one alter-Attalus II). An illegitimate son of Eumenes, Aristonicus, captured the throne after the death of Attalus III, and fought Rome: cf. Summary LIX.

A.U.C. 587

bilis altera res et proxima parricidio sit, quid ad 15 deliberationem dubii superesse? utrum enim partem regni petiturum esse, an totum erepturum? si partem, ambo infirmos distractis viribus et omnibus iniuriis profecto[1] obnoxios fore; si totum, privatumne ergo maiorem fratrem, an exulem esse[2] illa aetate, illa corporis infirmitate, an ad[3] ultimum mori 16 iussurum? egregium enim, ut fabulis traditus im-piorum fratrum eventus taceatur, Persei exitum videri, qui ex fraterna caede raptum diadema in templo Samothracum, velut praesentibus dis exigentibus poenas, ad pedes victoris hostis prostratus 17 posuerit. Eos ipsos qui non illi amici,[4] sed Eumeni infesti stimulent eum, pietatem constantiamque laudaturos, si fidem ad ultimum fratri praestitisset.

XX. Haec plus valuere in Attali animo. Itaque introductus in senatum gratulatus victoriam est; sua merita eo bello fratrisque, si qua erant, et Gallorum defectionem, quae nuper ingenti motu facta erat, 2 exposuit; petit ut legatos mitteret ad eos, quorum auctoritate ab armis avocarentur. His pro regni utilitate editis mandatis, Aenum sibi et Maroneam

[1] profecto Brakman: pro V: porro Hartel: populi Romani (i.e. ex pr.) Madvig.
[2] esse add. H. J. Müller: om. V.
[3] ad add. Duker: om. V.
[4] qui non illi amici Fr: quinillisamicis V.

[1] They were actually independent, but had been warned by Rome to keep the peace, according to XXXVIII. xl. 1; Polybius XXX. 3. also speaks of a "revolt" (aponoia).

native was in fact despicable and verging on the murder of kin, what remained in doubt to keep judgment in suspense? Was he in doubt whether to seek for part of the kingdom, or to seize it all? If he took part, both parts would be weakened by disruption of forces and without a doubt exposed to every kind of injury; if he took all, would his elder brother become a private citizen, or an exile at his age and with his weakness of body, or would Attalus in the end order his brother's death? To say nothing of the end of disloyal brothers as told in legend, the fate of Perseus seemed to be a notable example, for as he bowed himself down at the feet of a conquering enemy, he had laid aside in the temple of Samothrace, as if the gods had been there exacting his punishment, that crown which he had seized by means of a brother's murder. The very men, said Stratius, who were egging him on, no friends to him, but foes to Eumenes, would praise his loyalty and steadfastness, if he kept faith with his brother to the end. B.C. 167

XX. This reasoning prevailed on the mind of Attalus. On being presented to the senate, therefore, he offered congratulations on the victory; he explained his services during this war, and those of his brother, such as they were, as well as the revolt of the Galatians [1] which had recently taken place with great disturbance; he requested that the senate should send envoys to the Galatians, to induce them to lay aside their arms. Having delivered these messages in the interest of his state, he asked for Aenus and Maronea for himself.[2] Thus, after dis-

[2] Polybius says this request was not granted, because Attalus had disappointed the Roman hope that he would break with his brother.

A.U.C. 587

3 petit. Ita destituta eorum spe, qui fratre accusato partitionem regni petiturum crediderant, curia[1] excessit. Raro[2] alias quisquam rex aut privatus tanto favore tantoque omnium adsensu est auditus: omnibus honoribus muneribusque et[3] praesens est cultus et proficiscentem prosecuti sunt.

4 Inter multas Asiae Graciaeque legationes Rhodi-
5 orum maxime legati civitatem converterunt. Nam cum primo in veste candida visi essent, quod et gratulantis decebat, et, si sordidam vestem habuissent, lugentium Persei casum praebere speciem
6 poterant, postquam consulti ab M. Iunio consule patres stantibus in comitio legatis, an locum, lautia[4] senatumque darent, nullum hospitale ius in iis esse[5]
7 servandum censuerunt, egressus e curia consul, cum Rhodii gratulatum se de victoria purgatumque civitatis crimina dicentes venisse petissent, ut senatus
8 sibi daretur, pronuntiat sociis et amicis et alia comiter atque hospitaliter praestare Romanos et senatum dare consuesse: Rhodios non ita meritos eo bello, ut amicorum sociorumque[6] numero habendi sint;
9 his auditis prostraverunt se omnes humi consulemque et cunctos, qui aderant, orantes, ne nova falsaque

[1] curia Sigonius: curiam V.
[2] Raro J. F. Gronovius: ut raro V.
[3] et add. Fr: om. V.
[4] lautia Bas: lautianm V.
[5] in iis esse Kreyssig: inisse V.
[6] que add. Curio: om. V.

[1] Perhaps on the Graecostasis, an open platform, from which foreign envoys watched ceremonies; this was later located in the Forum.

[2] Formally, the Rhodians were not allies, having preferred to retain complete independence of action, cf. below xxv. 9.

appointing the hopes of those who had supposed that B.C. 167
he would accuse his brother and seek a division of the kingdom, he left the senate-house. Seldom has anyone else, king or citizen, been heard with as much good will and as much general approval; Attalus was honoured with every mark of attention and gift while he was there, and on his departure he was attended with equal ceremony.

Among the many embassies from Asia and Greece, the envoys of the Rhodians especially drew the city's attention. For they first appeared in white clothes, as was suitable for those offering congratulations—and had they worn soiled clothes, they might have offered the appearance of men mourning for the fall of Perseus. However, after the senate was consulted by Marcus Junius the consul, while the envoys stood in the assembly-ground,[1] whether lodgings, entertainment, and reception before the senate should be provided, and the Fathers had advised that none of the rights of hospitality should be granted in their case, the consul came forth from the senate-house, and in reply to the Rhodians, who said they had come to offer congratulations on the victory and to clear their city of the charges against it, and asked that a session of the senate be held for them, the consul announced that for allies and friends the Romans were accustomed to perform various acts of courtesy and hospitality, one of which was to grant a hearing before the senate, but the Rhodians during this war had not earned the right to be considered in the category of friends and allies.[2] On hearing this, the Rhodians threw themselves on the ground and begged the consul and all who were present not to adopt the principle that new and false charges

A.U.C. 587 crimina plus obesse Rhodiis aequum censerent quam antiqua merita, quorum ipsi testes essent. Extemplo veste sordida sumpta domos principum cum precibus ac lacrimis circumibant orantes, ut prius cognoscerent causam quam condemnarent.[1]

XXI. M'.[2] Iuventius Thalna praetor, cuius inter cives et peregrinos iurisdictio erat, populum adversus Rhodios incitabat rogationemque promulgaverat, ut Rhodiis bellum indiceretur, et ex magistratibus eius anni deligerent qui ad id bellum cum classe mitteretur, se eum sperans futurum esse. Huic actioni M. Antonius et M. Pomponius tribuni plebis adversabantur. Sed et praetor novo maloque exemplo rem ingressus erat, quod non ante consulto senatu, non consulibus certioribus factis de sua unius sententia rogationem ferret, vellent iuberentne Rhodiis bellum indici, cum antea semper prius senatus de bello consultus esset, deinde ex auctoritate[3] patrum ad populum latum, et tribuni plebis, cum ita traditum esset, ne quis prius intercederet legi quam privatis suadendi dissuadendique legem potestas facta esset, eoque persaepe evenisset, ut et[4] qui non professi

[1] condemnarent Crévier : condẽ narentur V.
[2] M'. Sigonius : T. V.
[3] ex auctoritate add. Kreyssig : om. V.
[4] ut et Kreyssig : uter V.

---

[1] Polybius XXX. 4. 5 says this occurred after the activity of Juventius mentioned just below.

[2] There was precedent, however, for action by the assembly over senatorial opposition, see XXI. lxiii. 3; XXXVIII. xxxvi. 8, and the note. A constitutional question is involved : war was regularly declared by the centuriate assembly, the oldest and least democratic gathering; but could the praetor summon this assembly, except for judicial purposes? The against the Rhodians should outweigh the good B.C. 167 services of long standing of which they themselves were witnesses. Forthwith the Rhodians put on mourning [1] and went the rounds of the houses of the chief men begging with tears and entreaties that they would hear the case before passing sentence.

XXI. Manius Juventius Thalna, the praetor with jurisdiction over suits between citizens and aliens, was stirring up the people against the Rhodians and had announced a motion to declare war against Rhodes and to choose from the magistrates of this year one to be sent to this war with a fleet (Juventius hoped that he would be the one designated). Such action was opposed by Marcus Antonius and Marcus Pomponius, tribunes of the people. But not only had the praetor in the first place undertaken the matter in a novel and dangerous fashion, because he was proposing entirely on his own initiative, without previously consulting the senate or notifying the consuls, to put to the people the question, whether it was their will and command that war should be declared against the Rhodians, whereas previously the senate had always been consulted first about war, and then the question brought before the people on the authority of the senate,[2] but the tribunes also were in the same position, since the custom was that no one should veto a law until opportunity was given to private citizens [3] to argue for and against the law; in this way it had often turned out either that those decision to relieve Messana which opened the First Punic War is a near parallel, though one faction of the senate led the appeal to the commons (Polybius I. 11. 1–3).

[3] Not excluding magistrates; Livy takes it for granted that they might address a meeting; for examples, see XXXIV. i. 7; v. 1; XLIII. xvi. 8.

A.U.C. 587

essent se intercessuros, animadversis vitiis legis ex
7 oratione[1] dissuadentium intercederent, et qui ad intercedendum venissent, desisterent victi auctoritatibus suadentium legem. Tum inter praetorem tribunosque omnia intempestive agendi certamen erat;
8 tribuni festinationem praetoris ante tempus intercedendo . . .[2] in adventum imperatoris . . .[3]

XXII. ". . . est. Peccaverimusne adhuc dubium est; poenas, ignominias omnes iam patimur. Antea, Carthaginiensibus victis, Philippo, Antiocho superatis, cum Romam venissemus, ex publico hospitio in curiam gratulatum vobis, patres conscripti, ex curia in Capitolium ad deos vestros dona ferentes ascende-
2 bamus;[4] nunc ex sordido deversorio, vix mercede recepti ac prope hostium more extra urbem manere iussi, in hoc squalore venimus in curiam Romanam Rhodii, quos provinciis nuper Lycia atque Caria, quos praemiis atque honoribus amplissimis donastis.
3 " Et Macedonas Illyriosque liberos esse, ut audimus, iubetis, cum servierint, antequam vobiscum
4 bellarent—nec cuiusquam fortunae invidemus, immo agnoscimus clementiam populi Romani—; Rhodios, qui nihil aliud quam quieverunt hoc bello, hostes

[1] oratione J. F. Gronovius: ratione V.
[2] lacunam indicat Sigonius.
[3] imperatoris Mantius: im V: lacuna folii unius.
[4] ascendebamus add. Giarratano: escendebamus add. Zingerle: om. V.

---

[1] Polybius XXX. 4. 6 says that Antonius, who had removed the praetor Juventius from the Rostra, introduced the Rhodians to the senate; Philophron spoke first, then Asty-who had not announced that they would exercise the veto did so when the faults of the law had been called to their attention by the speeches of those who opposed the law, or that those who had come intending to veto were overborne by the prestige of those who argued for the law. On this occasion the praetor and the tribunes vied with each other in doing everything in the wrong order; the tribunes by their premature veto . . . the haste of the praetor . . . till the arrival of the general . . .[1] B.C. 167

XXII. ". . . is. Whether we have done wrong is so far unproved, but we are already suffering all the penalties and disgrace. In former times, after the defeat of Carthage, when Philip or Antiochus had been subdued, on our arrival in Rome we came from public entertainment to the senate-house to offer you our congratulations, gentlemen of the senate, and from the senate-house we mounted to the Capitol, bearing gifts to your gods. Today from a mean inn, having hardly found shelter for pay and all but ordered like enemies to remain outside the city, we Rhodians in this mourning garb enter the senate-house of Rome—we to whom you lately presented the provinces of Lycia and Caria, who received from you the most unstinted rewards and honours.

" You are bidding the Macedonians and Illyrians be independent, we hear, though they were slaves before they waged war against you—nor are we jealous of anyone's good fortune, nay rather we recognize the mercy of the Roman People; and will you transform us Rhodians from allies into enemies—medes; Livy undertakes to reproduce the speech of the latter, though it is not found in Polybius, who criticized its tone adversely.

A.U.C. 587

5 ex sociis facturi estis? Certe iidem[1] vos estis Romani, qui ideo felicia bella vestra esse, quia iusta sint, prae vobis fertis, nec tam exitu eorum, quod vincatis, quam principiis, quod numquam[2] sine causa susci-
6 piatis, gloriamini. Messana in Sicilia oppugnata Carthaginienses, Athenae oppugnatae et Graecia in servitutem petita et adiutus Hannibal pecunia
7 auxiliis Philippum hostem fecerunt. Antiochus ipse ultro ab Aetolis, hostibus vestris, accersitus, ex Asia classe in Graeciam traiecit; Demetriade et Chalcide et saltu Thermopylarum occupato de possessione
8 imperii vos deicere est[3] conatus. Cum Perseo socii vestri oppugnati, aut[4] interfecti reguli principesque gentium aut populorum causa belli vobis fuere.
9 Quem tandem titulum nostra calamitas habitura est, si perituri sumus? nondum segrego civitatis causam a Polyarato et Dinone, civibus nostris, et iis, quos ut traderemus vobis, adduximus. Si omnes Rhodii aeque noxii essemus, quod nostrum in hoc bello
10 crimen esset? Persei partibus favimus et, quemadmodum Antiochi Philippique bello pro vobis adversus reges, sic nunc pro rege adversus vos stetimus.
11 Quemadmodum soleamus socios iuvare et quam impigre capessere bella, C. Livium, L. Aemilium

[1] iidem Madvig: quidē V.
[2] numquam Wesenberg: num V.
[3] est add. Novák: om. V. [4] aut Harant: alii V.

[1] In XXX. xxvi. 2–4, Livy reports grievances of Greece against Philip and a report of Macedonian aid to Carthage (203 B.C.); he also reports the presence of a Macedonian force at Zama (XXX. xxxiii. 6), though no mention is made of them during the battle; and later (XXX. xlii. 4–9) the ransom of Macedonian prisoners, said to be mercenaries, is discussed. See also XXXI. i. 10. But Polybius says nothing about this aid from Macedonia; Livy may, then, be quoting Roman us, who have been no worse than inactive in this war? B.C. 167

Surely you are the same Romans who boast that your wars are favoured of Fortune because they are just, nor do you exult as much in the outcome, because you conquer, as in the beginning, because you never undertake war without good cause. The siege of Messana in Sicily made the Carthaginians your enemies, the siege of Athens, the attempted enslavement of Greece and the aid given Hannibal in money and troops made Philip your foe.[1] Antiochus was summoned at the initiative of the Aetolians, your enemies; he crossed in person with his fleet to Greece; he seized Demetrias, Chalcis, and the pass of Thermopylae, and sought to cast you out of the tenure of your empire. With Perseus, your reason for war was the assault upon your allies, or the murder of princes and chiefs of nations or peoples.[2] Under what heading, pray, shall our downfall be placed, if we are to perish? For the present I am not separating the case for the city from Polyaratus and Dinon, our fellow-citizens, and from those whom we brought to hand over to you. If all we Rhodians were equally guilty, what would be the charge against us in this war? It would be that we took the side of Perseus and as we took a stand for you in the wars with Antiochus and with Philip against those kings, so now we sided with the king against you. How we are accustomed to help our allies, and how vigorously we enter into a war, you may ask Gaius Livius,[3] or rumour. Philip and Hannibal, while opposing Rome, seem to have been suspicious of each other, and each anxious that the other should not profit by the elimination of Rome.

[2] A statement of these charges is found in XLII. xiii and xl.

[3] Cf. XXXVI. ii. 14 and xlii for Livius; XXXVII. ii. 1 and 10; xiv. 1–3, etc., to lviii. 3–5 for Aemilius.

A.U.C. 587

Regillum interrogate, qui classibus vestris in Asia praefuerunt. Numquam vestrae naves pugnavere
12 sine nobis. Nos [1] nostra classe pugnavimus semel ad Samum, iterum in Pamphylia adversus Hannibalem
13 imperatorem; quae victoria nobis eo gloriosior est, quod, cum ad Samum magnam partem navium adversa pugna et egregiam iuventutem amisissemus, ne tanta quidem clade territi iterum ausi sumus [2]
14 regiae classi ex Syria venienti obviam ire. Haec non gloriandi causa rettuli—neque enim ea nunc nostra est fortuna—sed ut admonerem, quemadmodum adiuvare socios solerent Rhodii.

XXIII. "Praemia et Philippo et [3] Antiocho devictis amplissima accepimus a vobis. Si, quae vestra nunc est fortuna deum benignitate et virtute vestra, ea Persei fuisset, et praemia petitum ad victorem regem venissemus in Macedoniam, quid tandem diceremus?
2 pecuniane a nobis adiutum an frumento? auxiliis terrestribus an navalibus? quod praesidium tenuisse nos? ubi pugnasse aut sub illius ducibus aut [4] per nos
3 ipsos? si quaereret, ubi miles noster, ubi navis intra praesidia sua fuisset, quid responderemus? causam fortasse diceremus apud victorem, quem ad modum
4 apud vos dicimus. Hoc enim legatos utroque [5] de pace mittendo consecuti sumus, ut ne ab utraque

[1] nos add. Cobet: om. V.
[2] ausi sumus Fr: aus V.
[3] Philippo et add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[4] aut add. Fr: om. V.
[5] utroque de Fr: ultraquae V.

Lucius Aemilius Regillus, who commanded your B.C. 167 fleets in Asia. Never did your ships enter battle without ours. We fought independently first at Samos, and again off Pamphylia against the command of Hannibal: this victory gives us the more pride because, undismayed by the terrible catastrophe by which we had lost in the defeat at Samos a large part of our fleet and a splendid group of young men,[1] we dared to go out again to meet the king's fleet as it approached from Syria. These matters I have mentioned not for the sake of boasting, for indeed our present fortune does not permit that, but to make it clear how the Rhodians are accustomed to aid their allies.

XXIII. "The rewards which we received from you after the conquest of Philip and of Antiochus were most abundant.[2] If the good fortune which is now yours by the grace of the gods and because of your valour had fallen to Perseus, and we had come to Macedonia to seek a reward from the victorious king, what pray would we say? That we had aided him with money or with grain, with forces on land or on sea? What fortress had we held? Where had we fought either under his commanders or by ourselves? If he asked where there had been a soldier of ours, or where a ship, within his lines, what in the world would be our answer? Perhaps we should be defending ourselves before the conqueror, as now we are before you. For the result we obtained by sending envoys to both parties concerning peace was that we

[1] Livy tells of these battles in XXXVII. x–xi and XXXVII. xxiii–xxiv respectively.

[2] These are enumerated in XXXIII. xxx. 11 and XXXVIII. xxxix. 13 respectively.

A.U.C. 587

parte gratiam iniremus, ab altera etiam crimen et periculum esset. Quamquam Perseus vere obiceret, id quod vos non potestis, patres conscripti, nos principio belli misisse ad vos legatos, qui pollicerentur vobis, quae ad bellum opus essent; navibus,[1] armis, iuventute nos,[2] sicut prioribus bellis, ad omnia paratos fore. Ne praestaremus, per vos stetit, qui de quacumque causa tum aspernati nostra auxilia estis. Neque fecimus igitur quicquam tamquam[3] hostes, neque bonorum sociorum defuimus officio, sed a vobis prohibiti praestare fuimus. "Quid igitur? nihilne factum neque dictum est in civitate vestra, Rhodii, quod nolletis, quo merito offenderetur populus Romanus?" Hinc iam non, quod factum est, sum[4] defensurus—non adeo insanio—, sed publicam causam a privatorum culpa segregaturus. Nulla[5] est civitas, quae non et improbos cives aliquando et imperitam multitudinem semper habeat. Etiam apud vos fuisse audivi, qui adsentando multitudini grassarentur, et secessisse aliquando a vobis plebem nec in potestate vestra rem publicam fuisse. Si hoc in hac tam bene morata civitate accidere potuit, mirari quisquam potest aliquos fuisse apud nos, qui regis amicitiam petentes plebem nostram consiliis depravarent?

[1] navibus J. F. Gronovius: navalibus V.
[2] nos Pluygers: nostra V: nos nostra Drakenborch.
[3] tamquam Fr: tam V.
[4] sum add. Fr, Novák: om. V.
[5] nulla Madvig: nullam V.

[1] The story of this offer, and of the dismissal of the Rhodians as soon as they appeared at the Roman naval station, is told in XLII. xlv; lvi. 6; and Polybius XXVII. 7(6).

won no favour from either side, but incurred even B.C. 167 accusation and danger from one of them. Yet Perseus might truly reproach us, as you cannot, gentlemen of the senate, because we sent to you at the beginning of the war envoys to promise you whatever was needed for the war; we would be ready, we said, as in the former wars, with ships, arms, and young men for every demand. The obstacle to our furnishing these things was of your making, since you for whatever reason spurned our aid at that time.[1] Neither therefore have we in any way acted as enemies, nor have we failed in the duty of good allies, but we were prevented from performing that duty by you. 'What then? Has nothing been said or done in your city, Rhodians, which you would wish undone, at which the Roman People might justly take offence?' From this point I do not propose to defend what has happened—I am not so mad—but I propose to separate the defence of the state from the guilt of private citizens. There is no state which will not have not only wicked citizens at certain times but an inexperienced commonalty always. Even in your city I hear that there have been those who pursued ill-gotten gain by toadying to the mob, and that at certain times the commons seceded from you and you lost control of the commonwealth.[2] If this could happen in a state with so well disciplined a character, can any one marvel that there were some among us who in grasping after the king's friendship led our commons astray with their [2] Presumably the reference is to the struggles of patricians and plebeians, cf. III. xli. 5–6 and many other passages; for more recent instances, see above, p. 312, note 2.

A.U.C. 587

qui tamen nihil ultra valuerunt, quam ut in officio
11 cessaremus. Non praeteribo [1] id, quod gravissimum est in hoc bello crimen civitatis nostrae: legatos eodem tempore et ad vos et ad Persea de pace misimus; quod infelix consilium furiosus, ut postea
12 audivimus, orator stultissimum fecit, quem sic locutum constat, tamquam C. Popilius legatus Romanus, quem ad summovendos a bello Antiochum et Ptole-
13 maeum reges misistis, loqueretur. Sed tamen ea sive superbia, sive stultitia appellanda est, eadem, 14 quae apud vos, et apud Persea fuit. Tam civitatium quam singulorum hominum mores sunt; gentes quoque aliae iracundae, aliae audaces, quaedam timidae, in vinum, in venerem proniores aliae sunt.
15 Atheniensium populum fama est celerem et supra vires audacem esse ad conandum. Lacedaemoniorum cunctatorem et vix in ea, quibus fidit, ingredientem.
16 Non negaverim et totam Asiae regionem inaniora parere ingenia, et nostrorum tumidiorem sermonem esse, quod excellere inter finitimas civitates videamur, et id ipsum non tam viribus nostris quam vestris
17 honoribus ac iudiciis. Satis quidem et tunc in praesentia castigata illa legatio erat, cum tam tristi responso vestro dimissa. Si tum parum ignominiae pensum est, haec certe tam miserabilis ac sup-

[1] cessaremus. Non praeteribo Fr: caesaremnonutinonpraeteriuo V.

---

[1] The implication that the aristocracy of Rhodes favoured Rome is another indication of a situation found in many states. Cf. XLII. xxx. 1.

[2] This seems to be directly out of Thucydides I. 70–71, and must have been supplied by Livy, for Athens and Sparta had counsel?[1] However, these people wrought no B.C. 167 harm beyond slackness in our loyalty as friends. I shall not pass over the most serious charge against our city in this war: we sent envoys at the same time both to you and to Perseus on the subject of peace; this unhappy plan, through a madman, as we heard later, who was spokesman, became something extremely stupid, for he spoke, it is well known, as the Roman envoy Gaius Popilius might have spoken, whom you sent to turn back from war Kings Antiochus and Ptolemy. But nevertheless this error, whether it should be called arrogance or folly, was no different before you from what it was before Perseus. The character of states is like that of individual men; some nations are hot-tempered, some bold, some diffident, some over-indulgent in wine, others in sex. The people of Athens, report has it, is quick and bold beyond its strength in adventure, the Spartan hesitant and hardly undertaking matters of which it is sure.[2] I would not deny that all the region of Asia breeds somewhat flighty temperaments, and that our rhetoric is rather inflated[3] because we might seem to be outstanding among the states in our area—a position due precisely not to our own powers but to your favours and your choice of us. Enough punishment was meted out to that embassy on the spot and to their faces, when they were sent away with so grim an answer from you. But if at that time they paid too small a penalty of disgrace, certainly the present embassy, so not been conspicuous for these tendencies in the second century.

[3] But Cicero expressly acquits the Rhodians of indulging in "Asianic" oratory, Orator viii. 25.

A.U.C 587

plex legatio etiam insolentioris, quam illa fuit, le-18 gationis satis magnum piaculum esset. Superbiam, verborum praesertim, iracundi oderunt, prudentes inrident,[1] utique si inferioris adversus superiorem est: capitali poena nemo umquam dignam iudicavit.
19 Id enimvero periculum erat, ne Romanos Rhodii contemnerent. Etiam deos aliqui verbis ferocioribus increpant, nec ideo[2] quemquam fulmine ictum audimus.

XXIV. "Quid igitur superat, quod purgemus,[3] si nec factum hostile ullum nostrum est, et[4] verba tumidiora legati offensionem aurium, non perniciem
2 civitatis meruerunt? Voluntatis nostrae tacitae[5] velut litem aestimari vestris inter vos sermonibus audio, patres conscripti: favisse nos regi et illum vincere maluisse, ideo bello persequendos esse
3 credunt alii; alii[6] vestrum voluisse quidem nos hoc, non tamen ob id bello persequendos esse; neque moribus neque legibus ullius civitatis ita comparatum esse ut, si qui velit[7] inimicum perire, si[8] nihil
4 fecerit, quo id fiat, capitis damnetur. His, qui nos poena, non crimine liberant, gratiam quidem habe-

[1] inrident Curio: inriderent V.
[2] nec ideo Kreyssig: neeocid V.
[3] purgemus J. F. Gronovius: purgamus V.
[4] et add. Fr: om. V.
[5] tacitae I. Perizonius: tacite V.
[6] alii add. Heusinger: om. V.
[7] velit Vahlen: vellet V.
[8] si Vascosanus: utsii V.

[1] A sin-offering, as if to gods.
[2] Cf. the Guard to Creon in Antigone 317: "Are you stung in the ear, or in the mind?"
[3] Appraisal of damages was an important part of Roman pitiable and so humble, would be atonement[1] great enough for an even more arrogant embassy than that other one was. Arrogance, especially of speech, is hated by the hot-tempered, but laughed at by the wise, especially if directed by an inferior against his superior; no one has ever thought it worthy of the death-penalty. There was danger, to be sure, that the Rhodians should despise the Romans! Even the gods are assailed by some with overbold language, but we have never heard that any one has on that account been struck by a thunderbolt. B.C. 167

XXIV. "What then remains, of which we must clear ourselves, if there was never a hostile action on our part, and if the overweening words of an envoy should produce a disgust of the ear,[2] not the ruin of a city? I hear that in conversations among yourselves an appraisal of damages, so as to speak, is being made for our unexpressed desire;[3] some believe, gentlemen of the senate, that we favoured the king and preferred that he should win, and that therefore we should be punished by armed force; others of you feel that we did, to be sure, have this desire, but that we should not on that account be punished by armed force, for, they say, there is no provision in the law, written or unwritten, of any state that he who desires the death of his enemy, but does nothing to bring it about, shall incur capital punishment. To these men who free us of the penalty, but not of the guilt, we are indeed legal procedure, both civil and criminal; establishment of fines by statute was rare. The Rhodian is continuing the figure of the prejudged case. The "unexpressed desire" was for Perseus' success, so the Romans thought; the Rhodians' actual preference was probably for a stalemate, since they thrived on the balance of power.

A.U.C. 587

mus; ipsi nobis hanc dicimus legem: si omnes voluimus,[1] quod arguimur—non distinguimus voluntatem a facto—, omnes plectamur; si alii principum nostrorum vobis, alii regi faverunt, non postulo ut propter nos, qui partium vestrarum fuimus, regis fautores salvi sint; illud deprecor, ne nos propter illos 6 pereamus. Non estis vos illis infestiores, quam civitas est[2] ipsa; et hoc quia[3] sciebant, plerique eorum aut profugerunt aut mortem sibi consciverunt; alii damnati a nobis in potestate vestra erunt, patres 7 conscripti. Ceteri Rhodii sicut gratiam nullam meriti hoc bello, ita ne poenam quidem sumus. Priorum nostrorum benefactorum cumulus hoc, quod nunc 8 cessatum in officio est, expleat. Cum tribus regibus gessistis bella per hos annos; ne plus obsit nobis, quod uno bello cessavimus, quam quod duobus bellis 9 pro vobis pugnavimus. Philippum, Antiochum, Persea tamquam tris sententias ponite: duae nos absolvunt, una[4] dubia est: ut gravior sit, illi de nobis si[4] iudicarent, damnati essemus; vos iudicatis, patres conscripti, sit Rhodus in terris an funditus 10 deleatur: non enim de bello deliberatis, patres conscripti, quod inferre potestis, gerere non potestis, cum nemo Rhodiorum arma adversus vos sit[5] laturus. 11 Si perseverabitis in ira, tempus a vobis petemus, [1] voluimus Vascosanus: volumus V.

[2] est Madvig: et V. [3] quia I. Perizonius: qui V.
[4] una Fr: una aut V: si add. Fr: om. V: cola ita disposuit H. J. Müller. Post legere vult: una aut dubia es taut gravior. Sit: illi de nobis iudicarent, damnati essemus. "one is either undecided, or rather unfavourable. Be it so, they would be passing judgement, whether we were guilty or not guilty."

grateful; but these are the terms which we ourselves B.C. 167 set for ourselves: if we all have willed that of which we are accused—we do not separate the will from the deed—let us all suffer the penalty; but if some of our leaders favoured you, and others the king, I do not ask that because of us who sided with you the partizans of the king should be untouched; I merely beg that we may not perish because of them. You are no more hostile to them than is our state itself, and because they knew this, many of them have either fled or committed suicide; others who have been found guilty by us will be placed in your hands, gentlemen of the senate. The rest of us at Rhodes have no more deserved punishment during this war than we have deserved gratitude, either. Let the store of our previous helpful acts make good the present omission of service. You have waged wars against three kings during these years; let not our slackness in one war be, to our hurt, of more importance than the fact that we fought on your side in two wars. Take account of Philip, Antiochus, and Perseus as if of the vote of three judges; two acquit us, the third is undecided; suppose that it is for our condemnation; even so, if the Kings were judging us, we should indeed lose our case, but your judgment, gentlemen of the senate, determines whether Rhodes shall exist on earth or shall be destroyed root and branch. For you are not deliberating about war, gentlemen of the senate; you can declare it, but you cannot wage it, for not a man of Rhodes will bear arms against you. If you will not abate your wrath, we shall ask of you time in which to report

[5] sit add. Novák: om. V.

A.U.C 587

quo hanc funestam legationem domum referamus; omnia libera capita, quidquid Rhodiorum virorum feminarum est, cum omni pecunia nostra naves con-
12 scendemus ac relictis penatibus publicis privatisque Romam veniemus et omni auro et argento, quidquid publici, quidquid[1] privati est, in comitio, in vestibulo curiae vestrae cumulato, corpora nostra coniugumque ac liberorum vestrae potestati permittemus, hic
13 passuri, quodcumque patiendum erit; procul ab oculis nostris urbs nostra diripiatur, incendatur.
14 Hostis Rhodios esse Romani iudicare possunt, facere non possunt;[2] est enim et nostrum aliquod de nobis iudicium, quo numquam iudicabimus[3] nos vestros hostis, nec quicquam hostile, etiam si omnia patiemur, faciemus."

XXV. Secundum talem orationem universi rursus prociderunt supplices[4] ramosque oleae iactantes; tandem excitati curia excesserunt. Tunc sententiae
2 interrogari coeptae. Infestissimi Rhodiis erant, qui consules praetoresve aut legati gesserant in Macedonia bellum. Plurimum causam eorum adiuvit M. Porcius Cato, qui, asper ingenio, tum lenem mitemque
3 senatorem egit. Non inseram simulacrum viri copiosi,[5] quae dixerit referendo: ipsius oratio scripta

[1] quidquid . . . quidquid Fr: quaequod . . . quid V.
[2] possunt, facere non possunt Vahlen: possunt teste V: possunt, teste se Harant.
[3] quo . . . iudicabimus J. F. Gronovius: quod . . . iudicauimus V.
[4] supplices ibi posuit Boot: post oleae V.

home on this fatal mission; every free person, every B.C. 167 man and every woman of us in Rhodes will embark on ships with all our money and, abandoning our homes and our altars, will come to Rome; we will heap up in the assembly-ground and in the entry of your senate-house all our gold and our silver, whether owned by the state or its citizens, and will put our persons and those of our wives and children in your power, that we may suffer here whatever we must suffer;[1] far from our sight be the plundering and burning of our city. The Romans may judge that the Rhodians are enemies, but they cannot make them so. For we have also in us the power of passing judgment on ourselves, and we shall never adjudge ourselves your enemies, nor commit any act of hostility, though we suffer the utmost disaster."

XXV. Following a speech to this effect all the envoys again cast themselves down in the posture of suppliants, waving their olive-branches; after some time they were made to rise and left the senate-house. Then the roll-call of opinions began. The chief enemies of the Rhodians were those who had been conducting the war in Macedonia as consuls, praetors, or staff-officers. Great aid to the cause of Rhodes was given by Marcus Porcius Cato, who, though of a harsh temperament, on this occasion played the part of a tolerant and mild senator. I shall not include here a pale wraith of this eloquent man by reporting what he said; his own speech is [1] Livy perhaps had in mind the appeal of the whole people of Tusculum, VIII. xxxvii. 9.

---

[5] viri copiosi, quae Fr: uiricopiasidque V: veri, copiose quae Madvig.

A.U.C. 587

4 extat, Originum quinto libro inclusa. Rhodiis responsum ita redditum est ut nec hostes fierent nec socii permanerent.

Philocrates et Astymedes principes legationis erant. 5 Partim[1] cum Philocrate renuntiare Rhodum legationem placuit, partim cum Astymede Romae subsistere, qui[2] quae agerentur scirent[3] certioresque suos 6 facerent.[4] In praesentia deducere ante certam diem ex Lycia Cariaque iusserunt praefectos. Haec Rhodum nuntiata, quae per se tristia fuissent, quia maioris mali levatus erat timor, cum bellum timuissent, in gaudium 7 verterunt.[5] Itaque extemplo coronam viginti milium aureorum decreverunt; Theodotum, praefectum classis, in eam legationem miserunt. Societatem ab Romanis ita volebant peti ut nullum de ea re scitum populi fieret aut litteris mandaretur, quod, nisi impetrarent, maior a repulsa ignominia[6] esset. 8 Praefecti classis id unius erat ius, ut agere de ea re sine rogatione ulla perlata posset.

9 Nam ita per tot annos in amicitia fuerant, ut sociali foedere se cum Romanis non inligarent, ob nullam

[1] partim Madvig: partem V.
[2] qui add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[3] scirent J. F. Gronovius: sciret V.
[4] facerent J. F. Gronovius: faceret V.
[5] verterunt Heusinger: renuntiata uerierunt V.
[6] a repulsa ignominia Kreyssig: apulsaisnomina V.

[1] Small parts of this speech are reported by Gellius VI (VII) 3, especially 35. 37. 50, where arguments appear which Livy puts into the mouth of the Rhodian. Cato was an anti-imperialist, at least as to expansion eastward, which involved contact with what he regarded as the debilitating culture of Greece, so that his attitude in this matter was sincere, not a pose.

preserved in written form, as part of the fifth book of B.C. 167 his "Beginnings."[1] The reply to the Rhodians was couched in such form that they were neither declared enemies nor continued to be allies.

Philocrates and Astymedes were the leaders of this embassy. It was decided that some of them with Philocrates should report to Rhodes about the embassy, while some remained at Rome with Astymedes to keep track of what was being done and inform their people. For the time being orders were given that they should withdraw their governors from Lycia and Caria by a certain date. These actions were reported at Rhodes; of themselves they would have been grievous, but were turned into a cause for rejoicing, because the Rhodians were relieved of fear of a greater evil, since they had feared war. So they immediately voted a crown of twenty thousand gold pieces. They sent Theodotus,[2] the admiral of their fleet, on this embassy. They wanted to ask the Romans for an alliance in such fashion that no decree of the people concerning it should be passed or committed to dispatches, because if they did not obtain their request, the disgrace of an open repulse would be greater. The admiral of the fleet alone had the right to negotiate for such a purpose without the passing of any enabling resolution.

For the Rhodians had for all these years[3] maintained their friendship in such a way as not to bind themselves to the Romans by any treaty of alliance,

[2] Frequently mentioned by Polybius as a pro-Roman, e.g., XXVII. 14 (11), where the name is given as Theaedetus.

[3] Polybius XXX. 5. 6 says 140 years; the first embassy from Rhodes recorded by Livy in the extant text is over 100 years later, in 201 B.C., XXXI. ii. 1.

A.U.C. 587

aliam causam, quam ne spem regibus absciderent auxilii sui, si quid[1] opus esset, neu sibi ipsis fructus
10 ex benignitate et fortuna eorum percipiendi. Tunc utique petenda societas videbatur, non quae tutiores eos ab aliis faceret—nec enim timebant quemquam praeter Romanos—sed quae ipsis Romanis minus suspectos.

11 Sub idem fere tempus et Caunii descivere ab iis, et 12 Mylassenses Euromensium oppida occuparunt. Non ita fracti animi civitatis erant, ut non sentirent, si Lycia et Caria ademptae ab Romanis forent, cetera aut se ipsa per defectionem liberarent aut a finitimis occuparentur, includi se insulae parvae et sterilis agri litoribus, quae nequaquam alere tantae urbis popu-
13 lum posset. Missa igitur iuventute propere et Caunios, quamquam Cibyratarum asciverant auxilia, coegerunt imperio parere; et Mylassensis Alabandensisque, qui Euromensium[2] provinciam ademptum et ipsi coniuncto exercitu venerant,[3] circa Orthosiam acie vicerunt.

XXVI. Dum haec ibi, alia in Macedonia, alia Romae[4] geruntur, interim in[5] Illyrico L. Anicius rege Gentio, sicut ante dictum est, in potestatem redacto

[1] quid Kreyssig: quodid V.
[2] Alabandensisque, qui Euromensium Bekker: alabandeniquequialabande siumeuroaemensium V.
[3] et . . . venerant Madvig: at . . . venerunt V.
[4] Romae Fr: Romae in Asia V.
[5] in add. Fr: om. V.

---

[1] Alabanda and Mylassa lay to north and south, respectively, of Euromus. Rhodes had been interested in Euromus for some time, as shown by XXXII. xxxiii. 6, and probably by XXXIII. xxx. 3. If Livy's order of events is right, this early interest would explain why Rhodes kept Euromus, after the precisely for the purpose of not cutting off hope on the part of the kings that they would come to their aid, if need arose, as well as their own hope of reaping a harvest from the good will and good fortune of the kings. At this time they felt that they should by all means seek an alliance, not to protect themselves against other peoples, for they feared no one but the Romans, but to alleviate the Romans' suspicion of themselves. B.C. 167

At about the same time the Caunians revolted from them, and Mylassa seized the towns of the Euromenses. The spirit of Rhodes was not so broken that they did not perceive that if Lycia and Caria were taken away by the Romans, and the rest of their possessions either freed themselves by revolt or were seized by the neighbours, they would be hemmed in by the shores of a small island of infertile soil, which could by no means support the population of so large a city. Troops were therefore promptly sent and the Caunians compelled to accept their rule, even though forces of Cibyra were called in by the Caunians. Mylassa too and Alabanda, which had also come to join Mylassa in taking away the province of Euromus,[1] were defeated in battle near Orthosia.

XXVI. While these events were occuring in Asia, and the previously-mentioned events in Macedonia and at Rome, in Illyricum meanwhile, after taking King Gentius into custody, as previously related, Lucius Anicius put Gabinius in charge of the garrison "liberation" of Caria by the Romans; but Polybius puts the "liberation" after an interval following the return of the embassy, and the fighting may have taken place during this interval. Mylassa was left "tax-exempt," presumably autonomous, by the settlement with Antiochus, XXXVIII. xxxix. 8.

A.U.C. 587

2 Scodrae, quae regia fuerat, praesidio imposito Gabinium praefecit, Rhizoni et Olcinio, urbibus 3 opportunis, C. Licinium. Praepositis his Illyrico, reliquo exercitu[1] in Epirum est profectus. Ubi prima Phanote ei dedita est omni multitudine[2] cum 4 infulis obviam effusa. Hinc[3] praesidio imposito in Molossidem transgressus, cuius omnibus oppidis praeter Passaronem et Tecmonem et Phylacen et Horreum receptis primum ad Passaronem ducit. 5 Antinous et Theodotus principes eius civitatis erant, insignes et favore Persei et odio adversus Romanos; iidem universae genti auctores desciscendi ab 6 Romanis. Hi conscientia privatae noxae, quia ipsis nulla spes veniae erat, ut communi ruina patriae opprimerentur, clauserunt portas, multitudinem ut 7 mortem servituti praeponerent hortantes. Nemo adversus praepotentis viros hiscere audebat; tandem Theodotus quidam, nobilis et ipse adulescens, cum maior a Romanis metus timorem a principibus suis vicisset,

"Quae vos rabies" inquit "agitat, qui duorum hominum noxae civitatem accessionem facitis?[4] 8 Equidem pro patria qui letum oppetissent, saepe fando audivi; qui[5] patriam pro se perire aequum censerent, hi primi inventi sunt. Quin aperimus

[1] reliquo exercitu Wesenberg: reliquae exercitum V.
[2] dedita est omni multitudine Madvig: dedita totomniummultitudinem V.
[3] hinc Duker: hic V.
[4] civitatem . . . facitis J. F. Gronovius: civitates . . . factis V.
[5] qui add. Fr: om. V.

[1] They were on the coast.
[2] A different district of Epirus, Phanote being in Chaonia.

placed in Scodra, the capital, and Gaius Licinius in charge of the strategic cities [1] of Rhizon and Olcinium. After putting these men in charge of Illyricum, Anicius marched into Epirus with the rest of his army. In that region, Phanote the first city surrendered to him, all its population coming out with fillets to meet him. He placed a garrison here and passed on to Molossis,[2] and on recovery of all of its cities except Passaron, Tecmon, Phylace, and Horreum, he led his force first against Passaron. Antinoüs and Theodotus were the leading men of this city, distinguished both by their attachment to Perseus and their hatred of the Romans, and likewise responsible for the defection of the whole people from the Romans.[3] Because of their feeling of personal guilt, since there was no hope of pardon for them, these men shut the gates, in order to be buried in the general downfall of their city, and urged the people to prefer death to slavery. No one dared open his mouth against such all-powerful men. At last a certain Theodotus, a youth of equal rank, spoke out, his dread of the Romans outweighing his timidity before the chief men of his city. B.C. 167

"What is this madness," said he, "which is goading you, that you make the state an accessory to the crime of two men? Certainly I have often heard tales of those who met death for the fatherland; but these are the first ever known to believe that the fatherland ought to die for them. Why do we not

[3] Polybius XXVII. 15 (13) and XXX. 7 says that at the outset of the war, the Epirote leaders, including Antinoüs and the Cephalus mentioned below, wished to keep out of the war, though maintaining their alliance with Rome; but Charops the younger, by traducing them to Rome, compelled them to declare for Perseus in order to avoid arrest by the Romans.

A.U.C. 587

portas et imperium accipimus, quod orbis terrarum accepit?"

9 Haec dicentem cum multitudo sequeretur, Antinous et Theodotus in primam stationem hostium inruperunt atque ibi offerentes se ipsi volneribus
10 interfecti: urbs dedita est Romanis. Simili pertinacia Cephali principis[1] clausum Tecmonem ipso interfecto per deditionem recepit. Nec Phylace nec
11 Horreum oppugnationem tulerunt. Pacata Epiro divisisque in hiberna copiis per opportunas urbes, regressus ipse in Illyricum Scodrae, quo quinque legati ab Roma venerant, evocatis ex tota provincia
12 principibus conventum habuit. Ibi pro tribunali pronuntiavit de sententia consilii senatum populumque Romanum Illyrios esse liberos iubere; praesidia ex omnibus oppidis, arcibus,[2] castellis sese
13 deducturum. Non solum liberos, sed etiam immunes fore Issenses et Taulantios. Dassaretiorum Pirustas, Rhizonitas, Olciniatas, quod incolumi
14 Gentio ad Romanos defecissent. Daorsis quoque immunitatem dare, quod relicto Caravantio cum armis ad Romanos transissent. Scodrensibus et Dassarensibus et Selepitanis ceterisque Illyriis vectigal dimidium eius, quod regi pependissent,[3]
15 impositum.[4] Inde in tres partes Illyricum divisit. Unam eam fecit, quae supra Pistam[5] est, alteram Labeatas omnis, tertiam Agravonitas et Rhizonitas

[1] Cephali principis J. F. Gronovius: cepalonis principiis V.

[2] arcibus Wesenberg: arciuusest V.

[3] pependissent Sigonius: pendissent V.

[4] impositum add. Heraeus: om. V.

[5] quae supra Pistam C. Müller: q supra dictam V: Issam Madvig.

open our gates and accept the overlordship which B.C. 167
the world has accepted?"

When the crowd concurred with these remarks, Antinoüs and Theodotus charged into the first outpost of the enemy and, exposing themselves to wounds, were there killed; the city was surrendered to the Romans. By similar obstinacy on the part of Cephalus, the leading citizen, Tecmon was closed, but when he was killed, it was recovered by surrender. Neither Phylace nor Horreum stood up against attack. When order had been established in Epirus, and the troops distributed in winter quarters among suitable cities, Anicius returned to Illyricum, summoned the chief men from all his theatre of operations, and held a conference at Scodra, where the five commissioners from Rome had arrived. There he announced as officer in charge, on the advice of his council, that the Roman senate and people gave the Illyrians their freedom; he would remove his garrisons from all towns, citadels, and forts. Not only freedom, but tax-exemption as well would be granted, he said, to the people of Issa and Taulantia, and to the Pirustae among the Dassareti as well as to Rhizon and Olcinium, because they had gone over to the Romans while Gentius was still undefeated. The Daorsi would also be granted tax-exemption, because they had abandoned Caravantius and gone over with their arms to the Romans. On the people of Scodra, the Dassarenses, the Selepitani, and the rest of the Illyrians a tax was laid of half what they had paid to the king. Next, Anicius divided Illyricum into three parts. He made the first of these the region above Pista, the second all the Labeatae, and the third the Agravonitae, Rhizon et Olciniatas accolasque eorum. Hac formula dicta Illyrico [1] ipse inde [2] Epiri Passaronem in hiberna redit.

a.u.c. 587

XXVII. Dum haec in Illyrico geruntur, Paulus ante adventum decem legatorum Q. Maximum filium iam ab Roma regressum ad Aeginium et Agassas diripiendas mittit, Agassas, quod, cum Marcio consuli tradidissent urbem petita ultro societate Romana, defecerant rursus ad Persea; Aeginiensium novum crimen erat: famae de victoria Romanorum fidem non habentes in quosdam militum urbem ingressos hostiliter [3] saevierant. Ad Aeniorum quoque urbem diripiendam L. Postumium misit, quod pertinacius quam finitimae civitates in armis fuerant.

Autumni fere tempus erat; cuius temporis initio ad circumeundam Graeciam visendaque, quae [4] nobilitata fama maiora auribus accepta sunt quam oculis noscuntur, uti [5] statuit. Praeposito castris C. Sulpicio Gallo profectus cum haud magno comitatu, tegentibus latera Scipione filio et Athenaeo, Eumenis regis fratre, per Thessaliam Delphos petit,

[1] Illyrico Madvig: in Illyrico V.
[2] inde Harant: in V.
[3] hostiliter Kreyssig: quoque hostiliter urbem V.
[4] quae add. Fr: om. V.
[5] uti Madvig: ut V.

[1] This seems to be another version, or another phase, of the episode recorded in XLIV. xlvi. 3; if, as seems likely, Aeginium was in north-western Thessaly, its adherence to Perseus was more of a fault; but Paulus seems to have been looking for reasons which would justify the acquisition of plunder by the army. If, as Livy's arrangement implies, but does not make and Olcinium and their neighbours. After announcing this charter for Illyricum, Anicius returned from there into Epirus to his winter-quarters at Passaron. B.C. 167

XXVII. While these events were occurring in Illyricum, Paulus sent his son Quintus Maximus, who had by this time returned from Rome, to sack Aeginium and Agassae before the arrival of the ten commissioners. In the case of Agassae, the reason was that, although they had surrendered their city to the consul Marcius with a voluntary request for alliance with Rome, they had again gone over to Perseus. The fault of Aeginium was recent; because they did not believe the rumour about the Roman victory, they had cruelly treated as enemies certain soldiers who had entered their city.[1] Paulus also sent Lucius Postumius to sack the city of Aenia, because they had maintained resistance more stubbornly than the neighbouring cities.

It was about the season of autumn; Paulus decided to employ the beginning of this season travelling about Greece and seeing the sights which are made so famous by repute that they are greater by hearsay than by visual acquaintance. Putting Gaius Sulpicius Gallus in charge of the camp, he set out with no large escort, his son Scipio and Athenaeus, the brother of King Eumenes, serving as his personal aides. He went through Thessaly to Delphi, the [1] certain, these events occurred a year after the fall of Perseus, the justification for them is thin. Assuming this time-interval, however, we may suppose that the arrangements of the senate (xvii. 1) were made with the benefit of advice from Paulus, and that Paulus' sightseeing mentioned below was more in order than it would have been soon after the battle of Pydna.

A.U.C. 587

7 inclutum oraculum. Ubi sacrificio Apollini facto inchoatas in vestibulo columnas, quibus imposituri statuas regis Persei fuerant, suis statuis victor destinavit. 8 Lebadiae quoque templum Iovis Trophonii adit; ibi cum vidisset os specus, per quod oraculo utentes sciscitatum deos descendunt, sacrificio Iovi Hercynnaeque facto, quorum ibi templum est, Chalcidem ad spectaculum Euripi Euboeaeque, tantae [1] insulae, 9 ponte continenti iunctae descendit. A Chalcide Aulidem traicit, trium milium spatio distantem, portum inclutum statione quondam mille navium Agamemnoniae classis, Dianaeque templum, ubi navibus cursum ad Troiam filia victima aris admota 10 rex ille regum petiit. Inde Oropum [2] Atticae ventum est, ubi pro deo vates antiquus [3] colitur templumque vetustum est fontibus rivisque circa 11 amoenum; Athenas inde, plenas quidem et ipsas vetustae [4] famae, multa tamen visenda habentis, arcem, portus, muros Piraeum urbi iungentis, navalia, monumenta [5] magnorum imperatorum, simulacra

[1] Euripi Euboeaeque, tantae Weissenborn: euripiaeuoque ante V.
[2] petiit. Inde Oropum add. Fr: om. V.
[3] antiquus Kreyssig: anticum V.
[4] vetustae Köhler: vetustate V.
[5] monumenta add. Crévier: om. V.

---

[1] Polybius XXX. 10. 2 (14) reports the statues as actually erected.

[2] The identification of the oracular hero Trophonius with Zeus seems to be unofficial, though Strabo IX. ii. 38 (p. 414) also makes it. A description of the sanctuary, including the shrine of Hercynna, a nymph of a spring and stream, is given by Pausanias IX. xxxix.

[3] The ships enumerated in Homer's Catalogue are 1186; famous oracular shrine. There he offered sacrifice B.C. 167 to Apollo, and when he saw the columns which had been begun at the entrance, on which they were going to place statues of King Perseus, he reserved them for his own statues as conqueror.[1] At Lebadia also he visited the shrine of Jupiter Trophonius;[2] there he viewed the mouth of the cave through which those who use the oracle go down to make their inquiries of the gods, and offered sacrifice to Jupiter and Hercynna, whose temple is there. Paulus then went down to Chalcis to see the spectacle of the Euripus and of that great island Euboea which is joined by a bridge to the mainland. From Chalcis he crossed to Aulis, three miles away, with its harbour famous as the anchorage once upon a time for the thousand ships[3] of Agamemnon's fleet, and its temple of Diana, where the renowned king of kings sought passage to Troy for his ships by bringing his daughter as a victim to the altar. Thence Paulus went to Oropus in Attica, where an ancient prophet is worshipped as a god, and there is an old temple made charming by springs and streams around it.[4] Thence he went to Athens, which is also replete with ancient glory, but nevertheless has many notable sights, the Acropolis, the harbours, the walls joining Piraeus to the city, the shipyards, the monuments of great but the round number appears in Aeschylus, Vergil, and other poets before Marlowe.

[4] The "ancient prophet" was Amphiaraüs, of the Seven against Thebes. His sanctuary was established, according to archaeological evidence, near the end of the fifth century, and became a modest spa, which was favoured by the Romans; in 73 B.C., Amphiaraüs was officially recognized as a god by the consuls, with Cicero's assistance, and his lands were therefore tax-exempt, see Pausanias I. xxxiv and Fraser's note.

A.U.C. 587

deorum hominumque, omni genere et materiae et artium insignia.

XXVIII. Sacrificio Minervae, praesidi arcis, in urbe facto profectus Corinthum altero die pervenit. 2 Urbs erat tunc praeclara ante excidium; arx quoque et Isthmus praebuere spectaculum; arx intra moenia [1] in immanem altitudinem edita, scatens fontibus; Isthmus duo maria ab [2] occasu et ortu solis finitima artis faucibus dirimens. Sicyonem inde et Argos, nobiles urbes, adit; inde haud parem opibus 3 Epidaurum, sed inclutam Aesculapi nobili templo, quod quinque milibus passuum ab urbe distans nunc vestigiis revolsorum donorum, tum donis dives erat, quae remediorum salutarium aegri mercedem sacra- 4 verant deo. Inde Lacedaemonem adit, non operum magnificentia, sed disciplina institutisque memorabilem: [3] unde per Megalopolim Olympiam escendit. 5 Ubi et alia quidem spectanda ei [4] visa; Iovem velut praesentem intuens motus animo est. Itaque haud secus, quam si in Capitolio immolaturus esset, sacrificium amplius solito apparari iussit.

6 Ita peragrata Graecia, ut nihil eorum, quae quisque Persei bello privatim aut publice sensisset, inquireret,

[1] intra moenia J. F. Gronovius: inter omnia V.
[2] ab add. Fr: om. V.
[3] memorabilem Fr: memorabilem ac silentiam V.
[4] ei Madvig: et V.

---

[1] I.e., Athena Polias, or Poliouchos; Livy gives her the same title in XXXI. xxx. 9.

generals, and the statues of gods and men—statues notable for every sort of material and artistry. B.C. 167

XXVIII. After offering sacrifice to Minerva, the Guardian of the Citadel,[1] in Athens, Paulus set out for Corinth and reached it on the second day. The city was then world-famous before its destruction; its citadel and the Isthmus were also sights to see; the citadel rising to a huge height, enclosed by the city wall and flowing with springs, while the Isthmus separated by its narrow passage two neighbouring seas lying toward the sunrise and sunset. Thence Paulus went to Sicyon and Argos, both famous cities; from there he visited Epidaurus, by no means as wealthy a town, but noted for the famous temple of Aesculapius which, at a distance of five miles from the city, is now rich in the traces of gifts of which it has been robbed,[2] but then was rich in the gifts themselves which the sick had consecrated to the god as payment for health-giving remedies. Next he visited Lacedaemon, notable not for the splendour of its buildings, but for its discipline and institutions; from there he went up to Olympia via Megalopolis. At Olympia he saw many sights which he considered worth seeing; but he was stirred to the quick as he gazed on what seemed Jupiter's very self. Therefore he ordered a sacrifice prepared larger than usual, just as if he had been going to sacrifice on the Capitol.

In this way he travelled through Greece, raising no question as to how either any individual or any state had felt about the war with Perseus, so as not to [2] Perhaps by Sulla (Pausanias IX. vii. 5), who took the temple-treasures for his soldiers, and reimbursed the god with lands in Boeotia.

A.U.C. 587

ne cuius metu sollicitaret animos sociorum, Demetriadem cum reverteretur,[1] in itinere sordidata turba Aetolorum occurrit; mirantique et percunctanti, 7 quid esset, defertur quingentos quinquaginta principes ab Lycisco et Tisippo, circumsesso senatu per milites Romanos, missos ab[2] A. Baebio, praefecto[2] praesidii, interfectos, alios in exilium actos esse, bonaque eorum qui interfecti essent et exulum 8 possideri.[3] Iussis, qui arguebantur, Amphipoli adesse ipse convento[4] Cn. Octavio Demetriade, postquam fama accidit traiecisse iam mare decem legatos, omnibus aliis omissis Apolloniam ad eos pergit. 9 Quo cum Perseus obviam Amphipoli omni solutus[5] custodia processisset—id diei iter est—, ipsum quidem benigne adlocutus est; ceterum postquam in castra ad Amphipolim venit, graviter increpuisse tra- 10 ditur C. Sulpicium, primum quod Persea tam procul a se vagari per provinciam passus esset,[6] deinde quod adeo indulsisset militibus, ut nudare tegulis muros urbis ad tegenda hibernacula sua pateretur; referrique tegulas et refici detecta,[7] sicut fuerant, iussit. 11 Et Persea quidem cum maiore filio Philippo traditos A. Postumio in custodiam misit; filiam cum minore filio a Samothrace accitos Amphipolim omni liberali cultu habuit.

[1] reverteretur Wesenberg: revertit V: cum comitatu revertit Heraeus.
[2] ab . . . praefecto add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[3] possideri Kreyssig: possidere V.
[4] convento Kreyssig: conventu V.

trouble the minds of the allies by any fear. When B.C. 167 he was returning to Demetrias, he met a crowd of Aetolians in mourning; on his asking in surprise what was the matter, it was reported to him that five hundred and fifty leading men had been killed by Lyciscus and Tisippus, while the senate was surrounded by Roman soldiers sent by Aulus Baebius, the commander of the garrison; others had been driven into exile, and the property of those killed and of the exiles had been seized. Ordering the accused men to meet him at Amphipolis, he joined Gnaeus Octavius in Demetrias. When a report arrived that the ten commissioners had by now crossed the sea, he gave up everything else and went to them at Apollonia. There Perseus came to meet him from Amphipolis—a day's journey—free of any guard. Paulus greeted him in kindly fashion but after he arrived in camp at Amphipolis, he is said to have rebuked Gaius Sulpicius severely, first because he had allowed Perseus to roam so far from him through the province, and secondly because he had allowed the soldiers the great liberty of stripping the city walls of tiles, in order to roof over their winter-quarters; Paulus ordered the tiles taken back and the uncovered areas repaired to their previous condition. Perseus and his elder son Philip he turned over to Aulus Postumius and put under guard; Perseus' daughter and his younger son he summoned to Amphipolis from Samothrace and maintained completely in the state of free persons.

---

[5] omni solutus Madvig: nimissolutiscuius V.
[6] esset J. F. Gronovius: est V.
[7] refici detecta Madvig: referri et tecta V.

A.U.C. 587

XXIX. Ipse, ubi dies venit quo adesse Amphipoli denos principes civitatium iusserat litterasque omnis, quae ubique depositae essent, et pecuniam regiam conferri, cum decem legatis circumfusa omni multi-
2 tudine Macedonum in tribunali consedit. Adsuetis regio imperio tamen novi imperii formam[1] terribilem praebuit tribunal, summoto aditus,[2] praeco, accensus, insueta omnia oculis auribusque quae vel socios,
3 nedum hostis victos, terrere possent. Silentio per praeconem facto Paulus Latine, quae senatui, quae sibi ex consilii sententia visa essent, pronuntiavit. Ea Cn. Octavius praetor—nam et ipse aderat—interpretata sermone Graeco referebat.
4 Omnium primum liberos esse iubere Macedonas, habentis urbes easdem agrosque, utentes legibus suis, annuos creantis magistratus; tributum dimidium eius, quod pependissent regibus, pendere
5 populo Romano. Deinde in quattuor regiones dividi Macedoniam: unam fore et primam partem quod
6 agri inter Strymonem et Nessum sit amnem; accessurum[3] huic parti trans Nessum ad orientem versum, qua Perseus tenuisset, vicos, castella, oppida, praeter Aenum et Maroneam et Abdera; cis[4] Strymonem autem vergentia ad occasum, Bisalticam omnem
7 cum Heraclea, quam Sinticen appellant. Secundam fore regionem, quam ab ortu Strymo amplecteretur

[1] novi imperii formam Harant: novi in formā V.
[2] aditus Kreyssig: additu V.
[3] accessurum Fr, Hertz: sitsuccessurum V.
[4] Abdera; cis Madvig: Abderatis V.

[1] Typical Roman procedure; so ten leading men are summoned from some Latin colonies in XXIX. xv. 5; the Twelve Tables were also established by a board of ten.

[2] Amounting to 100 talents, according to Plutarch, Aemilius xxviii. 3.

XXIX. When the day arrived on which he had B.C. 167 ordered ten leading men from each city[1] to be at Amphipolis, and all official despatches which had been filed anywhere and the royal money to be brought in, Paulus with the ten commissioners took his official seat surrounded by the whole crowd of Macedonians. Although the latter were used to a royal court, yet the ceremonial of a new master was frightening as it met their eyes—the consul's bench, his entrance after the way had been cleared, the herald, and the orderly, all things novel to their eyes and ears, which might have inspired terror in allies, to say nothing of conquered enemies. After the herald had commanded silence Paulus announced in Latin the decisions of the senate, as well as his own, made by the advice of his council. This announcement was translated into Greek and repeated by Gnaeus Octavius the praetor—for he too was present.

The terms were: first of all the Macedonians were given their freedom; they were to keep their own cities and lands, to use their own laws, and to elect annual magistrates; they were to pay to the Roman People half the tax which they had paid to their kings.[2] Next, Macedonia was to be divided into four regions; one, the first section, would comprise the land between the Strymon and Nessus Rivers; to this region were to be added across the Nessus to the eastward the villages, forts, and towns which Perseus had held except Aenus, Maronea, and Abdera; on this side of the Strymon, too, toward the west there was included all the country of the Bisaltae, including Heraclea, the region they call Sintice. The second region was to be the region bounded on the east by the Strymon River, except amnis, praeter Sinticen, Heracleam et Bisaltas, ab occasuque Axius[1] terminaret fluvius, additis Paeonibus, qui prope Axium flumen ad regionem orientis 8 colerent. Tertia pars facta, quam Axius ab oriente, Peneus amnis ab occasu cingunt; ad septentrionem Bora mons obicitur; adiecta huic parti regio Paeonia, qua ab occasu praeter Axium amnem porrigitur; Edessa quoque et Beroea eodem concesserunt.

A.U.C. 587

9 Quarta regio trans Boram[2] montem, una parte confinis Illyrico, altera Epiro. Capita regionum, ubi concilia fierent, primae regionis Amphipolim, secundae Thessalonicen, tertiae Pellam, quartae Pelagoniam fecit. Eo concilia suae cuiusque regionis indici, pecuniam conferri, ibi magistratus creari iussit.
10 Pronuntiavit deinde neque conubium neque commercium agrorum aedificiorumque inter se placere
11 cuiquam extra fines regionis suae esse. Metalla quoque auri atque argenti non exerceri, ferri et aeris permitti.[3] Vectigal exercentibus dimidium eius impositum quod pependissent regi. Et sale invecto 12 uti vetuit. Dardanis repetentibus Paeoniam, quod et sua fuisset et continens esset finibus suis, omnibus

[1] occasuque Axius Madvig: occasuquaaesius V.
[2] Boram Fr: dorsuna V.
[3] ferri et aeris permitti Fr: nec fieri et aeris permittit V.

[1] What river is meant cannot be definitely determined; the famous Peneüs of Thessaly is too far south to be even the southern boundary, except at the sea-coast; but since Mount Bora is north-west rather than north of this region, Livy or his informant may have a distorted impression of the limits.

[2] This is usually the name of a region, not a city; perhaps Heraclea Lyncestis is meant; it would be appropriately central.

for Sintice, Heraclea, and the Bisaltae, while the western boundary would be the Axius River; this would also include the Paeonians who were settled near the Axius River in an easterly direction. The third region was established as that bounded on the east by the Axius, and on the west by the Peneüs River;[1] to the north Mount Bora forms a barrier; to this region was added that part of Paeonia which stretches along the west bank of the Axius River: Edessa and Beroea fell in the same part. The fourth region was across Mount Bora, part marching with Illyricum, the rest with Epirus. The capitals of the regions, where their assemblies were to meet, were established: for the first region, Amphipolis, for the second, Thessalonica, for the third, Pella, and for the fourth, Pelagonia.[2] In those places Paulus ordered an assembly[3] of each region to be appointed, money to be gathered, and magistrates elected. B.C. 167

Paulus then announced that it had been decided that no one should be allowed the right of marriage or of trading in land or buildings outside the bounds of his own region. Furthermore, the mines of gold and silver were not to be worked, but those of iron and copper were permitted. The tax on those who worked the mines was set at half what they had paid to the king. The use of imported salt was banned.[4] When the Dardanians asked for the return of Paeonia, on the ground that it had been theirs and adjoined

[3] Perhaps modelled after that of the Achaean League; if not formally restricted to men with a property qualification, it would become so, except for the populace of the capital itself.

[4] Perhaps as a further ban on frequent communication between the regions.

A.U.C. 587

dare libertatem pronuntiavit, qui sub regno Persei
13 fuissent. Post non impetratam Paeoniam salis commercium dedit: tertiae regioni imperavit, ut Stobos Paeoniae deveherent, pretiumque statuit.
14 Navalem materiam et ipsos caedere et alios pati vetuit. Regionibus, quae adfines barbaris essent—excepta autem tertia omnes erant—, permisit, ut praesidia armata in finibus extremis haberent.

XXX. Haec pronuntiata primo die conventus varie adfecerunt animos. Libertas praeter spem data
2 adrexit et levatum annuum vectigal; regionatim commercio [1] interruptis sua videri lacerata,[2] tamquam animali in artus alterum alterius indigentis distracto: adeo, quanta Macedonia esset, quam divisui facilis, quam se [3] ipsa quaeque contenta [4]
3 pars esset, Macedones quoque ignorabant. Pars prima Bisaltas habet, fortissimos viros—trans Nessum amnem incolunt et circa Strymonem—, et multas frugum proprietates et metalla et opportunitatem Amphipolis, quae obiecta claudit omnes ab oriente
4 sole in Macedoniam aditus. Secunda pars celeberrimas urbes Thessalonicen et [5] Cassandream habet, ad hoc Pallenen, fertilem ac frugiferam terram; maritimas quoque opportunitates ei praebent portus ad Toronen ac [6] montem Atho Aeneamque et Acanthum,[7] alii ad Thessaliam [8] insulamque

[1] commercio Bekker: mesico V.
[2] sua videri lacerata Harant: advideri lacerata V: ita videri lacerata Macedonia Vahlen.
[3] quam se H. J. Müller: et a se V.
[4] contenta Sigonius: cõ tempta V.
[5] et add. Fr: om. V.
[6] Toronen ac Drakenborch: toroneam V.
[7] Aeneamque et Acanthum H. J. Müller: eneaeuocanthunc V.

their boundaries, Paulus proclaimed that freedom was B.C. 167 being given to all those who had been subjects of Perseus. After refusing them Paeonia, he granted them the right to import salt; he ordered the third region to carry salt to Stobi in Paeonia, and he set a price on it. He forbade the Macedonians to cut ship-timbers, or to permit others to do so. The regions which bordered on barbarians—and this was true of all except the third—were allowed to have armed guards along their frontiers.

XXX. The announcement of these arrangements on the first day of the gathering aroused mixed emotions. The unexpected grant of freedom cheered men, as well as the lightening of the annual taxation; but to those who were cut off from trading between regions, their country seemed as mangled as an animal disjointed into parts, each of which needed the other; so unaware were the Macedonians themselves of the size of Macedonia, of how it lent itself to division, and of how self-sufficient each part was.

The assets of the first region are the Bisaltae, men of great courage (they live beyond the Nessus and around the Strymon), soil suitable for many different crops, mines, and the strategic position of Amphipolis, the interposition of which bars off every approach to Macedonia from the sunrise side. The second region has those highly flourishing cities Thessalonica and Cassandrea, and in addition, Pallene, a fertile and fruitful land; facilities for seafaring are also furnished it by the harbours at Torone, Mount Athos, Aenea, and Acanthus, some of which conveniently face Thessaly and the island of [8] ad Thessaliam add. Harant: om. V.

A.U.C. 587

Euboeam, alii ad Hellespontum opportune versi. Tertia regio nobilis urbes Edessam et Beroeam et Pellam habet et Vettiorum bellicosam gentem, incolas quoque permultos Gallos et Illyrios, impigros cultores. Quartam regionem Eordaei et Lyncestae et Pelagones incolunt; iuncta his Atintania et Tymphaeis et Elimiotis. Frigida haec omnis duraque cultu et aspera plaga est: cultorum quoque ingenia terrae similia habet. Ferociores eos et accolae barbari faciunt, nunc bello exercentes, nunc in pace miscentes ritus suos. Divisa itaque Macedonia [1] partium usibus separatis, quanta universa esset, ostendit.[2]

XXXI. Macedoniae formula dicta cum leges quoque se daturum ostendisset, Aetoli deinde citati. In qua cognitione magis utra pars Romanis, utra regi favisset quaesitum est, quam utra [3] fecisset iniuriam aut accepisset; noxa liberati interfectores; exilium pulsis aeque ratum fuit ac mors interfectis; A. Baebius unus est damnatus, quod milites Romanos praebuisset ad ministerium caedis.

Hic eventus Aetolorum causae in omnibus Graeciae gentibus populisque eorum, qui partis Romanorum fuerant, inflavit ad intolerabilem superbiam animos et obnoxios pedibus eorum subiecit quos aliqua parte suspicio favoris in regem contigerat. Tria genera

[1] itaque Macedonia Madvig: aitqaue Macedoniae V.
[2] universa esset, ostendit Madvig: universos tendit V.
[3] utra Kreyssig: utre V.

[1] Since the Macedonians were to "use their own laws" (above, xxix. 4), this must refer to a code for the four federal governments, either new or a revision of previous laws to

Euboea, and others the Hellespont. The third B.C. 167 region has the famous cities of Edessa, Beroea, and Pella, and the warlike race of the Vettii, as well as a large population of Gauls and Illyrians, who are industrious farmers. The fourth region is inhabited by the Eordaei, Lyncestae, and Pelagonians; added to these are Atintania, Tymphaeis, and Elimiotis. This part of the world is as a whole cold, difficult to cultivate, and harsh; it has inhabitants of temperament like their land. These are also made fiercer by their barbarian neighbours, who now give them training in warfare, now intermingle their practices during peace. The partition of Macedonia therefore showed, by separating the assets of the regions, how great the country is as a whole.

XXXI. After the proclamation of the charter for Macedonia, Paulus declared that he would also lay down a law-code,[1] and then proceeded to summon the Aetolians. In this investigation, the question was more which side had favoured the king and which the Romans, than which had done wrong or had been wronged; the assassins were acquitted of guilt; the exile of the expelled was confirmed quite as definitely as the death of the slain; only Aulus Baebius was condemned for furnishing Roman soldiers to help carry out the slaughter.

This outcome of the case of the Aetolians raised to an unbearable pitch of pride the spirits of those in all the states and peoples of Greece who sided with the Romans, and crushed helplessly under their feet any who were in some respect tainted by suspicion of having favoured the king. There were three sorts of meet the new arrangements and incorporate the Roman stipulations; cf. below, xxxii. 7.

A.U.C. 587

principum in civitatibus erant, duo, quae adulando aut Romanorum imperium aut amicitiam regum sibi privatim opes oppressis faciebant civitatibus; media una pars [1] utrique generi adversa libertatem leges- 5 que [2] tuebatur. His ut maior [3] apud suos caritas, ita minor ad externos gratia erat. Secundis rebus elati Romanorum partis eius fautores soli tum in magi- 6 stratibus, soli in legationibus erant. Hi cum frequentes et ex Peloponneso et ex Boeotia et ex aliis Graeciae conciliis adessent, implevere aures decem 7 legatorum: non eos tantum, qui se propalam per vanitatem iactassent tamquam hospites et amicos Persei, sed multo plures alios ex occulto favisse regi, qui [4] per speciem tuendae libertatis in conciliis 8 adversus Romanos omnia instruxissent, nec aliter eas mansuras in fide gentes, nisi fractis animis adversarum partium [5] aleretur confirmareturque auctoritas eorum qui nihil praeter imperium Romanorum spectarent.[6]

9 Ab his editis nominibus evocati litteris imperatoris ex Aetolia Acarnaniaque et Epiro et Boeotia, qui Romam ad causam dicendam sequerentur; in

[1] pars add. Madvig: om. V.
[2] legesque Wölfflin: leges V.
[3] ut maior add. Fr: om. V.
[4] regi, qui Madvig: reliqui V.
[5] adversarum partium Wesenberg: aptium V.
[6] spectarent J. F. Gronovius: expectarentur V.

[1] Polybius XXX. 6 names three groups, but only of those accused of being anti-Roman; his first group, corresponding to Livy's third, or middle-of-the-road group, wanted the leaders in the states, two groups who by fawning upon the Roman power and the friendship of kings respectively gained personal wealth for themselves by tyrannizing over their cities; the middle group alone, opposing both the others, strove to guard independence and constitutionality.[1] Their reward was greater affection from their own people, and less favour in foreign quarters. Carried along on the tide of Roman success, the members of the pro-Roman party were then alone occupying all magistracies and serving as envoys. These gathered in great numbers both from the Peloponnesus and Boeotia and the other leagues of Greece, and filled the ears of the ten commissioners, saying that not only those who out of vanity openly boasted themselves guests and friends of Perseus, but many more who kept under cover, had sided with the king, and under the guise of preserving independence they had turned the whole organization of the league meetings against the Roman interest; these peoples, said their representatives, would not maintain loyalty unless the spirit of the opposition was crushed and the prestige sustained and strengthened of those who had no object in view but the power of Rome. B.C. 167

Names were furnished by these men, and their opponents from Aetolia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Boeotia were summoned by dispatches from the general to follow him to Rome to stand trial.[2] Two status quo undisturbed; the second wanted a decisive contest between Rome and Perseus, with victory for Perseus; the third group shared the sentiments of the second, and in addition were able to draw their states into open alliance with Perseus.

[2] According to Polybius XXX. 13 (10). 11, Paulus did not take the accusations at face-value.

A.U.C. 587

Achaiam ex decem legatorum numero profecti duo, C. Claudius et Cn. Domitius, ut ipsi edicto evocarent.
10 Id duabus de causis factum, una quod fiduciae plus animorumque esse Achaeis ad non parendum credebant et forsitan etiam in periculo fore Callicraten et 11 ceteros criminum auctores delatoresque; altera cur praesentes evocarent causa erat, quod ex aliis gentibus principum litteras deprensas in commentariis regiis habebant, in Achaeis caecum erat crimen nullis eorum litteris inventis.
12 Aetolis dimissis Acarnanum citata gens. In his nihil novatum, nisi quod Leucas exempta est Acarna-
13 num concilio. Quaerendo deinde latius, qui publice aut privatim partium regis fuissent, in Asiam quoque
14 cognitionem extendere et ad Antissam[1] in Lesbo insula diruendam ac[2] traducendos Methymnam Antissaeos Labeonem miserunt, quod Antenorem, regium praefectum, quo tempore cum lembis circa Lesbum esset[3] vagatus, portu receptum commeatibus
15 iuvissent. Duo securi percussi viri insignes, Andronicus, Andronici filius, Aetolus, quod patrem secutus arma contra populum Romanum tulisset, et Neo Thebanus, quo auctore societatem cum Perseo iunxerant.

XXXII. His rerum externarum cognitionibus interpositis Macedonum rursus advocatum concilium;

[1] Antissam Fr, Drakenborch: intissam V.
[2] ac add. Wesenberg: om. V.
[3] esset Ruperti: est V.

[1] This was a serious matter, however; the town had sometimes served as the meeting-place of the league assembly. The Romans were taking control of the coast.

of the board of commissioners, Gaius Claudius and Gnaeus Domitius, set out for Achaia in order to summon men by proclamation on the spot. This they did for two reasons, first because they thought the Achaeans had more confidence and more pride to make them refuse obedience and perhaps also Callicrates and the other informers and purveyors of charges might be endangered; the second reason for the personal summons was that from the other leagues they had letters of the leaders that had been seized in the royal archives, but no letters from the Achaeans had been found and the charge against them was blind. B.C. 167

When the Aetolians had been dismissed, the Acarnanian League was called up. No changes were made concerning them, except that Leucas was removed from the Acarnanian federation.[1] In the course of more sweeping inquiries as to support of the king, either individual or by political units, the investigation was extended to Asia, and Labeo was sent to destroy Antissa on the island of Lesbos and to move its inhabitants to Methymna, because when Antenor, the king's admiral, had been roaming about Lesbos with his scout-ships, the people of Antissa had received him into their harbour and aided him with provisions. Two men of distinction were beheaded by the consul, Andronicus, son of Andronicus, an Aetolian, because following his father he had borne arms against the Roman People, and Neon of Thebes, who had indueed his people to make an alliance with Perseus.

XXXII. After the interruption due to these investigations of other peoples, the assembly of the Macedonians was again convened. Concerning the con-

A.U.C. 587

2 pronuntiatum, quod ad statum Macedoniae pertinebat, senatores, quos synhedros vocant, legendos esse,
3 quorum consilio res publica administraretur. Nomina deinde sunt recitata principum Macedonum, quos cum liberis maioribus quam quindecim annos
4 natis praecedere in Italiam placeret. Id, prima specie saevum, mox apparuit multitudini Macedonum pro libertate sua esse factum. Nominati sunt enim regis amici purpuratique, duces exercituum, praefecti navium aut praesidiorum, servire regi
5 humiliter, aliis superbe imperare adsueti; praedivites alii, alii, quos fortuna non aequarent, his sumptibus pares; regius omnibus victus vestitusque, nulli civilis animus, neque legum neque libertatis aequae
6 patiens. Omnes igitur, qui in aliquis ministeriis regiis, etiam qui in legationibus [1] fuerant, iussi Macedonia excedere atque in Italiam ire; qui non 7 paruisset imperio, mors denuntiata. Leges Macedoniae dedit cum tanta cura, ut non hostibus victis, sed sociis bene meritis dare videretur, et quas ne usus quidem longo tempore, qui unus est legum corrector, experiendo argueret.

8 Ab seriis rebus ludicrum, quod ex multo ante praeparato et in Asiae civitates et ad reges missis qui denuntiarent, et, cum circumiret ipse Graeciae civitates, indixerat [2] principibus, magno apparatu Am-

[1] in legationibus Kreyssig: in ministeriis in legationibus V.
[2] indixerat Fr: indignato V.

[1] In each of the four districts.

[2] Justinus XXXIII. 2. 7, says that these laws "are still in use", i.e., in the time of Trogus (first century after Christ), or possibly in that of Justinus himself (second century).

[3] Livy does not mention the destruction of the fortifications of Demetrias, one of the three "fetters of Greece", recorded by Diodorus XXXI. 13.

stitution of Macedonia it was announced that B.C. 167 senators, whom they call synhedri, were to be chosen, by whose advice affairs of state [1] were to be conducted. The names were read of the Macedonian leaders who, it had been decided, were to precede the consul on the way to Italy with their sons of over fifteen years of age. This ordinance, cruel at first glance, soon was seen by the commons of Macedonia to have been enacted in the interests of their freedom. For the names were those of the king's friends and the wearers of the purple, of commanders of armies, of officers in command of ships and garrisons—men accustomed to being humble slaves of the king, but haughty tyrants toward others. Some were exceedingly rich, others equalled in expenditure those whose fortunes they could not match; all of them used the diet and garments of the court, none had the temperament of a citizen, or would endure the rule of law and the give-and-take of free men. All, therefore, who had held some office under the king, even those who had served as ambassadors, were ordered to leave Macedonia and travel to Italy; death was the penalty announced for disobedience to this order. Paulus laid down laws for Macedonia with such care as to seem to be giving them not to conquered enemies, but to well-deserving allies—laws which not even experience over a long period, the one best amender of legislation, could prove faulty in actual use.[2]

After the serious business,[3] Paulus celebrated with great pomp at Amphipolis a festival which had been long under preparation, and to announce which he had sent men to the cities and the kings of Asia, while he himself had given notice to the leading men

A.U.C. 587

9 phipoli fecit. Nam et artificum omnis generis, qui ludicram artem faciebant, ex toto orbe terrarum multitudo [1] et athletarum et nobilium equorum convenit et legationes cum victimis et quidquid aliud deorum hominumque causa fieri magnis ludis in 10 Graecia solet, its factum est, ut non magnificentiam tantum, sed prudentiam in dandis spectaculis, ad quae rudes tum Romani erant, admirarentur. 11 Epulae quoque legationibus paratae et opulentia et cura eadem. Vulgo dictum ipsius ferebant et convivium instruere et ludos parare eiusdem esse, qui vincere bello sciret.

XXXIII. Edito ludicro [2] clupeisque aereis in naves impositis cetera omnis generis arma cumulata in [3] 2 ingentem acervum, precatus Martem, Minervam Luamque [4] matrem et ceteros deos, quibus spolia hostium dicare ius fasque est, ipse imperator face subdita succendit: deinde circumstantes tribuni militum 3 pro se quisque ignes coniecerunt. Notata est in illo conventu Europae Asiaeque, undique partim ad gratulationem, partim ad spectaculum contracta multitudine, tantis navalibus terrestribusque exerci- 4 tibus, ea copia rerum, ea vilitas annonae, ut et privatis et civitatibus et gentibus dona data pleraque eius generis sint ab imperatore, non in usum praesentem, 5 sed etiam quod domos aveherent. Spectaculo fuit

[1] multitudo Fr: omnis multitudo V.
[2] ludicro Wesenberg: ludicro omnis generis V.
[3] in add. Fr: om. V.
[4] Luamque Turnebus: Lunamque V.

---

[1] What the Greeks called theoriai—official representatives of their states, who participated by offering sacrifices.

during his tour of the Greek cities. For a crowd of B.C. 167 all sorts of professionals in the art of entertainment gathered from all over the world, as well as athletes and famous horses; moreover there were delegations with sacrifices,[1] and whatever more is usually done at the great games of Greece for the sake of gods or men, was so carried out as to arouse admiration not only for lavishness but for skill in giving shows, at which Romans were then tyros. Banquets for the delegations were also prepared with equal sumptuousness and pains. From mouth to mouth went the saying of Paulus himself, that the man who knew how to conquer in war could also arrange a banquet and organize games.

XXXIII. After the festival had been held and the bronze shields loaded into ships, the rest of the arms of all kinds were piled up into a great heap, and the general, after prayer to Mars, Minerva, Mother Lua,[2] and the other gods to whom it is right and lawful to dedicate the spoils of the enemy, with his own hands put the torch to the pile; then each of the military tribunes as they stood round about tossed in fire. In that great gathering of Europe and Asia, when such a crowd had assembled partly to offer congratulations and partly for the display, and in the presence of such forces naval and military, a remarkable fact was that supplies were so abundant and grain so cheap that both to individuals and to cities and peoples abundant gifts of such supplies were made by the general, not only for immediate use, but to be taken home with them. The eyes of [2] Consort or companion of Saturn, she was a destructive power to be placated, cf. VIII. i. 6 and the note, and perhaps Servius on Aeneid III. 139 (Luae emended from Lunae).

A.U.C. 587

ei, quae venerat, turbae non scaenicum magis ludicrum, non certamina hominum aut curricula equorum, quam praeda Macedonica omnis ut viseretur exposita, statuarum tabularumque et textilium[1] et vasorum ex auro et argento et aere et ebore
6 factorum ingenti cura in ea regia, ut non in praesentem modo speciem, qualibus referta regia Alex-
7 andreae erat, sed in perpetuum usum fierent. Haec in classem imposita devehenda Romam Cn. Octavio data.

Paulus benigne legatis dimissis transgressus Strymonem mille passuum ab Amphipoli castra posuit;
8 inde profectus Pellam quinto die pervenit. Praetergressus urbem, ad Pellaeum,[2] quod vocant, biduum moratus, P. Nasicam et Q. Maximum filium cum parte copiarum ad depopulandos Illyrios, qui Persea iuverant bello, misit iussos ad Oricum sibi occurrere; ipse Epirum petens quintis decimis castris Passaronem pervenit.

XXXIV. Haud procul inde Anici castra aberant. Ad quem litteris missis, ne quid ad ea quae fierent moveretur: senatum praedam Epiri civitatium, quae
2 ad Persea defecissent, exercitui dedisse suo,[3] missis centurionibus in singulas urbes, qui se dicerent ad praesidia deducenda venisse, ut liberi Epirotae sicut Macedones essent, denos principes ex singulis evocavit civitatibus; quibus cum denuntiasset ut aurum

[1] et textilium Madvig: ex tilium V.
[2] Pellaeum Heraeus: paeleum V.
[3] suo Madvig: suos V.

---

[1] A similar triumphal display is recorded in XXVI. xxi. 7–8 (from Syracuse); and the Romans' interest in looted art

the crowd which came were no more drawn to the stage spectacle, the contests of men, or the racing of the horses, than to the collected loot of Macedonia, set out on exhibition, statues, paintings, rare stuffs, and vessels made of gold, silver, bronze and ivory, manufactured with great pains in the palace at Pella, so as to serve not only for immediate show, as did the objects with which the palace at Alexandria was crammed, but for continuous use.[1] This booty was loaded on the fleet and given to Gnaeus Octavius to transport to Rome. B.C. 167

After a courteous farewell to the delegates, Paulus crossed the Strymon and pitched camp a mile from Amphipolis; thence he set out for Pella and arrived on the fifth day. Passing by the city to what is called the Pellaeum, he halted for two days, and sent his son Quintus Maximus and Publius Nasica with a portion of the troops to ravage Illyrians who had helped Perseus in the war, ordering the expedition to meet him at Oricum; the consul himself made for Epirus and reached Passaron on the fifteenth day.

XXXIV. Not far from here was the camp of Anicius. Paulus sent him despatches, so that there should be no disturbance over what was about to take place, saying that the senate had granted to Paulus' army the booty from those cities of Epirus which had deserted to Perseus. The consul sent centurions to the several cities, who were to say that they had come to remove the garrisons so that the people of Epirus might be free like the Macedonians; ten leading men from each city were summoned to the consul. These men were instructed is expressed in XXXII. xvi. 17 (Chalcis) and XXXVIII. ix. 13 (Ambracia).

A.U.C. 587

atque argentum in publicum proferretur, per omnes 3 civitates cohortes dimisit. Ante in ulteriores quam in propiores profecti, ut uno die in omnes perveni-4 retur. Edita tribunis centurionibusque erant, quae agerentur. Mane omne aurum argentumque conlatum; hora quarta signum ad diripiendas urbes 5 datum est militibus; tantaque praeda fuit, ut in equitem quadringeni denarii, peditibus duceni dividerentur, centum quinquaginta milia capitum 6 humanorum abducerentur. Muri deinde direptarum urbium diruti sunt; ea fuere oppida circa septuaginta.
Vendita praeda omnis, inde [1] ea summa militi numerata est.

7 Paulus ad mare Oricum descendit nequaquam, ut ratus erat, expletis militum animis, qui, tamquam nullum in Macedonia gessissent bellum, expertis 8 regiae praedae esse indignabantur. Orici cum missas cum Scipione Nasica Maximoque filio copias invenisset, exercitu in naves imposito in Italiam 9 traiecit. Et post paucos dies Anicius conventu reliquorum Epirotarum Acarnanumque acto iussisque in Italiam sequi principibus, quorum cognitionem causae senatui [2] reservarat, et ipse navibus expectatis, quibus usus Macedonicus exercitus erat, in Italiam traiecit.

[1] omnis, inde Madvig: omni unde V.
[2] senatui add. Duker: om. V.

---

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xxix. 3, says that only 11 drachmas per soldier were realized, that is, about 13 denarii; this would explain the dissatisfaction of the soldiers mentioned below, to have the gold and silver collected at the civic centre. Then cohorts were sent to all the cities, those bound for the more distant leaving before those for the nearer, so that they would arrive at all the towns on the same day. The tribunes and centurions had been instructed as to their mission. Early in the day all the gold and silver was collected; at the fourth hour the soldiers were given the signal to plunder the towns. So great was the booty that a distribution was made of four hundred denarii apiece to the cavalry, and two hundred apiece to the infantry,[1] and one hundred and fifty thousand persons were removed. The walls of the plundered cities were destroyed; the number of communities was about seventy. All the booty was sold, and from the proceeds the amounts given above were paid to the army. B.C. 167

Paulus went down to the sea at Oricum, having by no means met the expectations of the soldiers, as he had supposed he would; the men were complaining that they had no share in the booty from the king, as if they had fought no campaign in Macedonia. On finding at Oricum the troops he had sent with Scipio Nasica and his son Maximus, Paulus embarked his army on ships and crossed to Italy. A few days later Anicius, after waiting for the ships which the army of Macedonia had used, crossed to Italy, first holding an assembly of the remaining Epirotes and Acarnanians, and ordering the leaders, judgment about whom he had reserved for the senate, to follow him to Italy.

but implies a serious and improbable miscalculation on the part of Paulus. In xxx. 1, Plutarch apologizes for Paulus in respect to this action, which is charged to the senate.

A.U.C. 587

10 Cum haec in Macedonia Epiroque gesta sunt, legati, qui cum Attalo ad finiendum bellum inter Gallos et regem Eumenem missi erant, in Asiam
11 pervenerant.[1] Indutiis per hiemem factis et Galli domos abierant et rex in hiberna concesserat Pergamum gravique morbo aeger fuerat. Ver primum eos[2] domo excivit iamque Synnada pervenerant et Eumenes ad[3] Sardis undique exercitum contraxerat.
12 Ibi Romani cum Solovettium,[4] ducem Gallorum, Synnadis esse comperissent eo proficisci decreverunt ad colloquium; Attalus[5] cum eis profectus, sed castra Gallorum intrare eum non placuit, ne animi
13 ex disceptatione irritarentur. P. Licinius consularis cum[6] regulo Gallorum est locutus rettulitque fero-
14 ciorem eum deprecando factum, ut mirum videri possit[7] inter tam opulentos reges, Antiochum Ptolemaeumque, tantum legatorum Romanorum verba valuisse ut extemplo pacem facerent, apud Gallos nullius momenti fuisse.

XXXV. Romam primum reges captivi, Perseus et Gentius, in custodiam cum liberis abducti, dein turba alia captivorum, tum quibus Macedonum denuntiatum erat ut Romam venirent, principumque
2 Graeciae; nam ii[8] quoque non solum praesentes

[1] pervenerant Wesenberg: pervenerunt V.
[2] eos Harant: ex V.
[3] et Eumenes ad Madvig: cum Eumenis ab V.
[4] Solovettium Madvig: et Solovettium V.
[5] Synnadis esse comperissent eo proficisci decreverunt ad colloquium; Attalus Madvig: synnadesad locutusettalus V.
[6] cum add. Fr: om. V.
[7] possit Madvig: posset V.
[8] ii Bekker: hii V.

While these events were occurring in Macedonia and Epirus, the commissioners who had been sent with Attalus to put an end to the war between the Galatians and King Eumenes, arrived in Asia. A truce had been declared for the winter; the Galatians on their side had returned to their homes, and the king had gone into winter-quarters at Pergamum and was ill with a serious disease. Early spring called the Galatians into the field, and they had by this time reached Synnada; Eumenes had mustered an army from all sides at Sardis. At that city the Romans learned that Solovettius the Galatian leader was at Synnada, and decided to go there to confer with him; Attalus set out with them, but it was decided that he should not enter the camp of the Galatians, lest tempers be lost during an altercation. Publius Licinius, an ex-consul,[1] talked with the prince of the Galatians and reported that he had been emboldened by the appeal to him, so that it was occasion for wonder that the words of Roman envoys had had such weight with those prosperous kings Antiochus and Ptolemy that they at once made peace, whereas with the Galatians Roman words were without effect. B.C. 167

XXXV. In Rome first the captive kings, Perseus and Gentius, were placed in custody with their children, next the horde of other prisoners, and after them the Macedonians who had been ordered to come to Rome, and the leaders of Greece, for these men too had not only been summoned when at home, [1] Head of this embassy (Polybius XXX. 3) and consul 4 years before, XLII. xxix. 1. Polybius implies that the embassy was not really meant to restrain the Galatians, as shown by the actual results.

A.U.C. 587

exciti erant. sed etiam, si qui apud reges esse dicebantur, litteris arcessiti sunt. Paulus ipse post dies paucos regia nave ingentis magnitudinis, quam sedecim versus remorum agebant, ornata Macedonicis spoliis non insignium tantum armorum, sed etiam regiorum textilium, adverso Tiberi ad urbem est subvectus, completis ripis obviam effusa multitudine. Paucos post dies Anicius et Octavius classe sua advecti. Tribus iis omnibus decretus est ab senatu triumphus mandatumque Q. Cassio praetori, cum tribunis plebis ageret, ex auctoritate patrum [1] rogationem ad plebem ferrent, ut iis, quo die urbem triumphantes inveherentur, imperium esset.

Intacta invidia media sunt: ad summa ferme tendit. Nec de Anici nec de Octavi triumpho dubitatum est; Paulum, cui ipsi quoque se comparare erubuissent, obtrectatio carpsit. Antiqua disciplina milites habuerat: de praeda parcius, quam speraverant ex tantis regiis opibus, dederat nihil relicturis, si aviditati indulgeretur, quod in aerarium deferret. Totus Macedonicus exercitus imperatori iratus neglegenter erat [2] adfuturus comitiis ferendae legis. Sed eos Ser. Sulpicius Galba, qui tribunus

[1] ageret, ex auctoritate patrum Duker: ex auctoritate patruum ageret V.

[2] iratus neglegenter erat Weissenborn: ita neglegenter V: erat neglegenter Fr.

---

[1] Polybius XXX. 9, gives an illustration of this: Polyaratus the Rhodian was at the court of Ptolemy; Popilius ordered him to be sent to Rome. Ptolemy sent him instead to Rhodes, but Polyaratus jumped ship at Phaselis, in eastern Lycia, and again at Caunus; then he took refuge at Cibyra, but was finally rounded up and taken to Rome.

[2] Perhaps the one left to Philip by the treaty of 196 B.C.: XXXIII. XXX. 5.

but if any of them were reported as being at the B.C. 167 courts of the kings, they had also been sought out by letter.[1] After a few days, Paulus himself sailed up the Tiber to the city in a royal galley of immense size, which was driven by sixteen banks of oars,[2] and decorated with the spoils of Macedonia, not only splendid armour, but also royal fabrics. The banks were lined with the crowd which had poured out to welcome him. A few days later Anicius and Octavius arrived aboard their fleet. A triumph was decreed to all three commanders by the senate, and Quintus Cassius the praetor was assigned the task of arranging with the tribunes of the commons that they should propose to the commons, on motion of the senate, a resolution that the commanders should keep their authority of office on the day on which they rode into the city in triumph.[3]

Moderate circumstances are unassailed by envy; that passion always aims at the heights. There was no debate over the triumphs for Anicius and Octavius; but defamation attacked Paulus, to whom the others themselves would have blushed to compare themselves. He had held the soldiers to old-fashioned discipline; he had given them less of the booty than they had hoped for from such lavish royal resources, though had he given rein to their greed, they would have left nothing to be deposited in the public treasury. The whole army of Macedonia, angered at their general, were prepared to be slack in attending the assembly for passing the law. But Servius Sulpicius Galba, who had been military tribune of the [3] A similar provision for Marcellus' ovation over Syracuse is recorded in XXVI. xxi. 5. For the voting of a triumph over the refusal of the senate, see III. lxiii. 8–11 and the note.

A.U.C. 587

militum secundae legionis in Macedonia fuerat, privatim imperatori inimicus, prensando ipse et per suae legionis milites sollicitando stimulaverat, ut 9 frequentes ad suffragium adessent. Imperiosum ducem et malignum antiquando rogationem, quae de triumpho eius ferretur, ulciscerentur. Plebem urbanam secuturam esse militum iudicia. Pecuniam illum dare non potuisse; militem honorem dare posse. Ne speraret ibi fructum gratiae, ubi non meruisset.

XXXVI. His incitatis cum in Capitolio rogationem eam Ti. Sempronius tribunus plebis ferret et privatis de [1] lege dicendi locus esset et [2] ad suadendum, ut in 2 re minime dubia, haud quisquam procederet, Ser. Galba repente processit et a tribunis postulavit ut, quoniam hora iam octava diei esset, nec satis temporis ad demonstrandum haberet, cur L. Aemilium non iuberent [3] triumphare, in posterum diem differrent et mane eam rem agerent: integro sibi die ad
3 causam eam orandam opus esse. Cum tribuni dicere eo die, si quid vellet, iuberent,[3] in noctem rem dicendo extraxit referendo admonendoque exacta acerbe munia militiae; plus laboris, plus periculi, quam desiderasset res, iniunctum; contra in praemiis,
4 in honoribus omnia artata; militiamque, si talibus succedat ducibus, horridiorem asperioremque bel-

[1] de add. J. F. Gronovius: om. V.
[2] et add. Madvig: om. V.
[3] iuberent Hertz: iuberet V.

second legion in Macedonia, and was personally B.C. 167 hostile to the general, had egged on the men to appear for voting in full numbers, by buttonholing the men himself and urging them through the soldiers of his legion. Let them, said Sulpicius, avenge themselves on their domineering and stingy leader by voting down the proposal concerning his triumph; the city commons would follow the opinion of the soldiers. Paulus had been unable to give them money; but the rank and file were able to award honours. Let him not look for a harvest of gratitude where he had not earned it.

XXXVI. Such was the urging of Sulpicius. When Titus Sempronius, tribune of the commons, proposed this resolution on the Capitol, and opportunity was given to citizens to speak concerning the law, hardly anyone came forward to urge passage, since the case seemed quite clear. Suddenly Servius Galba came forward and asked of the tribunes, inasmuch as it was now the eighth hour of the day, and time would not serve for him to show cause why they should not allow Lucius Aemilius to celebrate a triumph, that they should adjourn to the following day, and bring the matter up early, because he needed a full day to present his arguments. When the tribunes ordered him to say what he wished on that day, he prolonged the meeting till nightfall with his speaking, recalling and reminding them of the harsh enforcement of military duties; more toil and more danger had been imposed, he said, than the situation demanded; on the other hand, rewards and honours had been without exception restricted; and military service, if success attended this sort of leadership, would be more dreadful and full of hardships in warlantibus,[1] eandem victoribus inopem atque inhonoratam futuram. Macedonas in meliore fortuna quam milites Romanos esse. Si frequentes postero die ad legem antiquandam adessent, intellecturos potentis viros non omnia in ducis, aliquid et in militum manu esse.

A.U.C. 587

6 His vocibus incitati postero die milites tanta frequentia Capitolium compleverunt, ut aditus nulli 7 praeterea ad suffragium ferendum esset. Intro vocatae primae tribus cum antiquarent, concursus in Capitolium principum civitatis factus est, indignum facinus esse clamitantium L. Paulum tanti belli 8 victorem despoliari[2] triumpho; obnoxios imperatores tradi licentiae atque avaritiae militari. Iam nunc nimis saepe per[3] ambitionem peccari; quid, si domini milites imperatoribus imponantur? in Galbam pro se quisque probra ingerere.

9 Tandem hoc tumultu sedato M. Servilius, qui consul et magister equitum fuerat, ut de integro eam rem[4] agerent ab tribunis petere, dicendique sibi 10 ad populum potestatem facerent. Tribuni cum ad deliberandum secessissent, victi auctoritatibus principum de integro agere coeperunt revocaturosque se easdem tribus pronuntiarunt, si M. Servilius aliique privati, qui dicere vellent, dixissent.

[1] asperioremque bellantibus Fr: asperiorem vellentibus V.
[2] despoliari J. F. Gronovius: dispoliari V.
[3] militari. Iam nunc nimis saepe per Jacobs: militariinunonimisseper V.
[4] rem add. Fr: om. V.

time, and after victory would moreover be left without funds or honours. The fate of the Macedonians was preferable, said Galba, to that of the Roman soldiers. If they turned out in large numbers on the next day to reject the law, men with authority would be made aware that not everything was under the control of the leader, but something also under that of the soldiers. B.C. 167

Roused by these utterances, the soldiers next day filled the Capitol with such a crowd that no one else could approach to cast his vote. When the first tribes [1] called within the enclosure voted against the law, the leaders of the state hastened to gather on the Capitol, crying out that it was an unworthy action to rob Lucius Paulus of his triumph when he had won so great a war; the generals were being helplessly subjected to the insubordination and greed of their men. Even now wrong action was all too often taken for the sake of currying favour; what would happen if soldiers were made the masters of their generals? Each man hurled reproaches on his own score against Galba.

When this uproar had at last been calmed, Marcus Servilius, who had been consul and master of the horse, requested of the tribunes that they should conduct this balloting anew, and give him an opportunity to speak to the people. After the tribunes had retired to consider the proposal, overborne by the influence of the leading men, they began to repeat the proceedings, and announced that they would call the same tribes again, once Marcus Servilius and other citizens who wished to speak, had had their say.

[1] Plutarch Aemilius xxxi. 1 says that the vote of the first tribe gave the signal for the protest of the senators.

A.U.C. 587

XXXVII. Tum Servilius:[1] "quantus imperator L. Aemilius fuerit, Quirites, si ex alia re nulla aestimari posset,[2] vel hoc satis erat quod, cum tam seditiosos et leves milites, tam nobilem, tam temerarium, tam eloquentem ad instigandam multitudinem inimicum in castris haberet, nullam in exercitu sedi- 2 tionem habuit. Eadem severitas imperii, quam nunc oderunt, tum[3] eos continuit. Itaque antiqua disciplina habiti neque dixerunt seditiose quicquam neque[4] fecerunt.

3 "Servius quidem Galba, si in L. Paulo accusando tirocinium ponere et documentum eloquentiae dare voluit, non triumphum impedire debuit, quem, si 4 nihil aliud, senatus iustum esse iudicaverat, sed postero die quam triumphatum esset,[5] privatum eum cum[6] visurus esset, nomen deferret et legibus interrogaret; aut serius paulo, cum primum magistratum[7] ipse cepisset, diem diceret inimico et eum ad[8] 5 populum accusaret. Ita et pretium recte facti triumphum haberet L. Paulus pro egregie bello gesto et poenam, si quid et vetere gloria sua et nova indignum fecisset.

[1] Tum Servilius add. Fr: om. V.
[2] posset Madvig: possit V.
[3] tum Weissenborn: ut V.
[4] habiti neque dixerunt seditiose quicquam neque Vahlen: habita neque V.
[5] esset J. F. Gronovius: est V.
[6] cum add. J. F. Gronovius, Wesenberg: om. V.
[7] magistratum Kreyssig: magistratus V.
[8] et eum ad Madvig: cum ad V.

XXXVII. Then Servilius said: "If it were im- B.C. 167 possible, fellow-citizens, to determine from anything else how great a general Lucius Aemilius has shown himself to be this one criterion would have sufficed —that although he had in camp such mutinous and unreliable soldiers, as well as a personal enemy of such high rank, so rash, and so eloquent a rabble-rouser, yet Paulus had no breach of discipline in his army. The same strictness of command which now they hate at that time restrained them. Consequently, being kept under old-fashioned discipline, they neither said nor did anything mutinous.

"As for Servius Galba, if he wished by accusing Lucius Paulus to put his apprenticeship behind him and offer proof of his skill as an orator,[1] he should not have interfered with the triumph, which the senate had adjudged to be proper, to say nothing of other considerations. Rather on the day after the triumph was celebrated, when he would see Paulus a private citizen, he should bring accusation and question him according to law,[2] or a little later, when Galba entered upon his first public office, he should summon his enemy to trial and accuse him before the people. Thus there would accrue to Lucius Paulus not only the triumph which is the due reward for his success in gloriously conducting the war, but also punishment, if he had done anything unworthy of his laurels, both new and old.

[1] Galba became a noted orator, cf. Cicero, Brutus xxi. 82 and xxii. 86.

[2] This latter refers to an arraignment of the accused, at which the "question" was whether he pleaded guilty or not guilty.

A.U.C. 587

6 "Sed videlicet, cui nullum[1] crimen, nullum probrum dicere poterat, eius obtrectare laudes voluit. Diem integrum hesterno die ad[2] accusandum L. Paulum petit; quattuor horas, quantum supererat
7 diei, dicendo absumpsit. Quis umquam tam nocens reus fuit, cuius vitia vitae tot horis expromi non possent? quid interim obiecit, quod L. Paulus, si
8 causam dicat, negatum velit? Duas mihi aliquis contiones parumper faciat, unam militum Macedonicorum, puram alteram et[3] integrioris iudicii a favore et odio, universi populi Romani.[4]

Apud contionem togatam et urbanam prius reus
9 agatur. Quid apud Quirites Romanos, Ser. Galba, diceres? Illa enim tibi tota abscisa oratio esset 'in statione severius et intentius stetisti;[5] vigiliae acerbius et diligentius circumitae sunt; operis plus quam antea fecisti, cum ipse imperator ut[6] exactor circumiret; eodem die et iter fecisti et in aciem ex
10 itinere existi; ne[7] victorem quidem te adquiescere passus est; statim ad persequendos hostes duxit. Cum te praeda partienda locupletem facere posset, pecuniam regiam translaturus in triumpho est et in 11 aerarium laturus.' Haec sicut ad militum animos stimulandos aliquem aculeum habent, qui parum licentiae, parum avaritiae suae inservitum censent,

[1] nullum add. Novák: om. V.
[2] ad add. Vascosanus: om. V.
[3] et hic posuit H. J. Müeller: post iudicii V.
[4] universi populi Romani Madvig: uniuersisiūd. c. $\overline{\text{pr}}$. V.
[5] stetisti Madvig: institisti V.
[6] ut Weissenborn: et V.
[7] existi; ne add. Heraeus: om. V.

"But, if you please, Galba wished to tarnish the B.C. 167 praises of the man to whom he could ascribe no crime, no guilt. Yesterday he asked for a full day in which to accuse Lucius Paulus; actually he squandered in speaking four hours, all that was left of the day. What defendant was ever so guilty that the faults in his life could not be expounded in all those hours? What did Galba say in this time which Lucius Paulus would want to deny, if he were on trial? Let someone, pray, call two meetings for a moment, one of the army of Macedonia, the other unprejudiced and of judgment less impaired by partisanship or hate, a meeting of the whole Roman people.

"Let the defendant be brought first before the meeting in mufti—the civilians. What would you say before the citizen-body of Rome, Servius Galba? For all your speech of yesterday would be cut short: 'You were posted on guard too strictly and watchfully; the sentries were inspected too severely and too frequently; you got more work done than formerly, because the general himself was going the rounds to see that it was done; on the same day you made a march and went from the march out to battle;[1] even when you had won the battle he did not let you rest—he led you at once in pursuit of the enemy. Although he might have made you rich by dividing the spoil, he is planning to carry the royal treasure in his triumph and deposit it in the treasury.' These statements, though they have a certain sting to provoke the temper of the soldiers, who think that Paulus has catered too little to their lack of discipline and their greed, would just as surely have had no

[1] Actually the soldiers had called for battle, and Paulus had refused it, XLIV. xxxvi. 3.

A.U.C. 587

12 ita apud populum Romanum nihil valuissent, qui, ut vetera atque audita a parentibus suis non repetat, quae ambitione imperatorum clades acceptae sint, quae severitate imperii victoriae partae, proximo certe Punico bello, quid inter M. Minucium magistrum equitum et Q. Fabium Maximum dictatorem 13 interfuerit, meminit. Itaque apparuisset neque[1] accusatorem hiscere potuisse et supervacaneam defensionem[2] Pauli fuisse.

14 "Transeatur ad alteram contionem; nec Quirites vos, sed milites videor appellaturus, si nomen hoc saltem ruborem incutere et verecundiam aliquam imperatoris violandi adferre possit.

XXXVIII. "Equidem ipse aliter adfectus animo sum, qui apud exercitum mihi loqui videar, quam paulo ante eram, cum ad plebem urbanam spectabat 2 oratio. Quid enim[3] dicitis, milites? aliquis est Romae, praeter Persea, qui triumphari de Macedonibus nolit, et eum non isdem manibus discerpitis, quibus Macedonas vicistis? Vincere vos prohibuisset, si potuisset, qui triumphantis urbem inire 3 prohibet. Erratis, milites, si triumphum imperatoris tantum et non militum quoque et universi populi 4 Romani esse decus censetis. Non unius in hoc Pauli honos agitur.[4]

[1] apparuisset neque add. Vahlen: om. V.
[2] hiscere . . . defensionem Vahlen: iscire . . . defensione V.
[3] enim Muretus: etiam V.

power to move the Roman people; for even though B.C. 167
the people should not recall the old stories which they heard from their fathers of disasters suffered because generals courted popularity, and of victories won by strictness of command, yet the people surely remember the late Punic War, and what a difference there was between Marcus Minucius the master of horse, and Quintus Fabius Maximus the dictator. And so it would have been clear that the accuser could not open his mouth, and that a defence of Paulus was superfluous.

"Let us pass over to the other meeting; and I think I will not address you as 'Citizens,' but as 'Soldiers,' in case this title may at least bring a blush to your cheeks, and instill some scruple against maltreating your general.

XXXVIII. "Indeed the state of my own feelings is different, when I picture myself speaking before the army, than it was previously, when my speech was directed toward the people of the city. For what do you mean, soldiers? Is there anyone in Rome except Perseus who does not want the triumph over Macedonia to be celebrated? And are you not ready to tear such an objector to pieces with the same hands with which you conquered the Macedonians? He who prevents you from entering the city in triumph would have prevented you from winning the victory, had he been able. You are wrong, soldiers, if you suppose that a triumph is an honour only to the general, and not also to the soldiers and to the Roman People as a whole. It is not the glory of Paulus alone which is at stake in this matter.

[4] honos agitur add Madvig: om. V.

A.U.C. 587

"Multi etiam, qui ab senatu non impetrarunt triumphum, in monte Albano triumpharunt; nemo L. Paulo magis eripere decus perfecti belli Macedonici potest quam C. Lutatio primi Punici belli, quam P. Cornelio secundi, quam illis, qui post eos[1] triumphaverant; nec L. Paulum minorem aut maiorem imperatorem triumphus faciet; militum magis in hoc universique populi Romani fama agitur, primum ne invidiae et ingrati animi adversus clarissimum quemque civem opinionem habeat et imitari in hoc populum Atheniensem lacerantem invidia principes suos videatur. Satis peccatum in Camillo a maioribus vestris est, quem tamen ante receptam per eum a Gallis urbem violarunt; satis nuper a[2] vobis in P. Africano. Literni domicilium et sedem fuisse domitoris Africae, Literni sepulcrum ostendi erubescamus. Gloria sit[3] par illis viris L. Paulus, iniuria vestra ne exaequetur.[4]

"Haec igitur primum infamia deleatur, foeda apud alias gentes, damnosa apud nostros. Quis enim aut Africani aut Pauli similis esse in tam[5] ingrata et inimica bonis civitate velit? si infamia nulla esset et de gloria tantum ageretur, qui tandem triumphus non communem nominis Romani gloriam habet? Tot de Gallis triumphi, tot de Hispanis, tot de Poenis

[1] illis, qui post eos Sigonius: illi qui V.
[2] nuper a Madvig: insuper V.
[3] sit Madvig: sic V.
[4] ne exaequetur Madvig: exsequetur V.
[5] in tam add. Bas: om. V.

---

[1] Cf. XXXVIII. liii. 8 and lvi. 3, where Livy says he is following Valerius Antias.

" Furthermore, many who did not secure a triumph B.C. 167 from the senate celebrated their triumph on the Alban Mount. No one can deprive Lucius Paulus of the glory of bringing the Macedonian war to an end any more than he can deprive Gaius Lutatius of credit for the First Punic War, or Publius Cornelius of that for the Second, or the others who have more recently celebrated triumphs. A triumph will make Lucius Paulus neither greater nor less as a general; rather it is the reputation of the soldiers and that of the Roman People as a whole which is at stake in this matter, in the first place that Rome may not gain a reputation for a jealous and ungrateful spirit toward her most distinguished citizens, and seem in this respect to be imitating the people of Athens who in their envy buffet their leading men. Enough of a crime was committed by your ancestors against Camillus—though they wronged him before his recovery of the city from the Gauls; enough was done by yourselves against Publius Africanus. Let us blush that the home and abode of the conqueror of Africa was at Liternum, and that it is at Liternum that his tomb is displayed.[1] Let Lucius Paulus rival these men in glory, but let him not be their equal in suffering injustice at your hands.

"Let therefore this disgrace be in the first place blotted out—a disgrace odious before other peoples, and harmful to ourselves. For who would want to emulate either Africanus or Paulus in a city so ungrateful and so hostile to excellence? If there were no question of disgrace, and only glory were at stake, what possible triumph does not embody the glory of the Roman name which we all share? Are the many triumphs which have been celebrated over the Gauls, ipsorum tantum imperatorum an populi Romani dicuntur? Quemadmodum non de Pyrrho modo nec de Hannibale, sed de Epirotis Carthaginiensibusque[1] triumphi acti sunt, sic non M'. Curius tantum nec P. Cornelius, sed Romani triumpharunt.

A.U.C. 587

12 Militum quidem propria est causa, qui et ipsi laureati et quisque donis, quibus donati sunt, insignes Triumphum nomine cientes[2] suasque et imperatoris
13 laudes canentes per urbem incedunt. Si quando non deportati ex provincia milites ad triumphum sunt,[3] fremunt; et tamen tum[4] quoque se absentis, quod suis manibus parta victoria sit, triumphare
14 credunt. Si quis vos interroget, milites, ad quam rem in Italiam deportati et non statim confecta provincia dimissi sitis, quid Romam frequentes sub signis veneritis, quid moremini hic et non diversi domos quisque abeatis vestras, quid aliud respondeatis, quam vos triumphantis videri velle? Vos certe victores conspici velle debebatis.

XXXIX. "Triumphatum nuper de Philippo, patre huius, et de Antiocho est; ambo regnabant, cum de iis[5] triumphatum est. De Perseo capto, in urbem cum liberis adducto[6] non triumphabitur?
2 Quodsi in curru scandentis Capitolium, auratos

[1] Carthaginiensibusque Fr: Carthaginiensibus et Macedonibus V.
[2] cientes Madvig: cient V.
[3] sunt Madvig: sint V.
[4] tum Gruter: suum V.
[5] iis Kreyssig: his V.
[6] adducto Perizonius: abducto V.

[1] There is a reference to the victory of Curius in Summary XIV; Scipio's triumph is mentioned in XXX. xlv.

over the Spaniards, over the Carthaginians spoken of B.C. 167 as pertaining merely to the generals themselves, or to the Roman People? Just as triumphs are celebrated, not merely over Pyrrhus or Hannibal, but over the people of Epirus or Carthage, so not Manius Curius or Publius Cornelius alone,[1] but the Romans celebrated the triumph. Soldiers indeed are directly interested in the matter, for they too are crowned with laurel, while each man is adorned with the decorations he has been given; they parade through the city invoking the spirit of Triumph by name and singing their own praises and those of their general. If on some occasion the soldiers are not brought back from the field for the triumph, they grumble; and yet even on such an occasion they believe that they are included in the triumph, though absent, because the victory has been won by their hands. If someone should ask you, soldiers, for what purpose you were transported to Italy, and were not dismissed at once when your mission had been completed, if he should ask why you had come to Rome in complete military units, why you were lingering here and were not dispersing, each to his own home, what would you answer but that you wished to be seen celebrating your triumph? Certainly you yourselves ought to have wanted to make a public appearance as conquerors.

XXXIX. "Triumphs have been celebrated in recent years over Philip, the father of this king, and over Antiochus; both were still on the throne when the triumph was celebrated. Shall no triumph be celebrated over Perseus, who was taken prisoner and brought with his children to Rome? Nay, if while the other commanders were mounting the Capitol in purpuratosque, ex inferiore loco L. Paulus in turba togatorum unus privatus interroget ' L. Anici, Cn. Octavi, utrum vos digniores triumpho esse an me censetis ? ' curru ei cessuri et [1] prae pudore videntur

A.U.C. 587

3 insignia ipsi sua traditurі. Et vos Gentium quam Persea duci in triumpho mavoltis, Quirites, et de accessione potius belli quam de bello triumphari ?
4 Et legiones ex Illyrico laureatae urbem inibunt et navales socii ; Macedonicae legiones suo abrogato triumphos alienos spectabunt ? Quid deinde tam opima praeda,[2] tam opulentae victoriae spoliis fiet ?
5 quonam abdentur illa tot milia armorum detracta corporibus hostium ? an in Macedoniam remittentur ? quo signa aurea, marmorea, eburnea, tabulae pictae, textilia, tantum argenti caelati, tantum auri, tanta
6 pecunia regia ? an noctu tamquam furtiva in aerarium deportabuntur ? quid ? illud spectaculum maximum, nobilissimus opulentissimusque rex captus, ubi
7 victori populo ostendetur ? [3] Quos Syphax rex captus, accessio Punici belli, concursus fecerit, plerique meminimus. Perseus rex captus, Philippus et Alexander, filii regis, tanta nomina, subtrahentur
8 civitatis oculis ? Ipsum L. Paulum, bis consulem, domitorem Graeciae, omnium oculi conspicere urbem curru ingredientem avent ; ad hoc fecimus consulem,

[1] curru ei cessuri et Wachendorf : currumicẽ suriest V.
[2] opima praeda J. F. Gronovius : opimae praedae V.
[3] ostendetur Gruter : ostenditur V.

the chariot, arrayed in their gold and purple, from B.C. 167 below them Lucius Paulus, a lone citizen in the crowd of civilians, should ask them, 'Lucius Anicius, Gnaeus Octavius, do you consider yourselves more worthy of a triumph, or me?' they would, I believe, yield him their place in the chariot and for very shame hand their regalia over to him. Do you prefer, fellow-citizens, to have Gentius rather than Perseus led in a triumph, and the celebration to be made for an appendage to the war rather than for the war itself? The legions from Illyricum will also enter the city crowned with laurel, and so will the sailors; shall the legions of Macedonia witness the triumphs of others after their own has been cancelled? What then shall become of so kingly a booty, of the spoils of so rich a victory? What, pray, shall be the hiding-place for all those thousand sets of arms stripped from the bodies of the enemy? Shall they be sent back to Macedonia? What of the golden statues, the marbles, the ivories, the paintings, the rare stuffs, all the embossed silver, all the gold, all the royal money? Shall they be carried to the treasury by night as if stolen? And what is more—that greatest of shows, a royal prisoner of highest birth and greatest riches—where shall he be displayed to the people who have gained the victory? Many of us can recall what crowds were drawn by the sight of King Syphax as prisoner, an appendage to the war with Carthage. Shall our prisoner King Perseus, shall the king's sons, Philip and Alexander, names of such potency,—shall they be removed from the sight of the commonwealth? Lucius Paulus himself, twice consul, conqueror of Greece—all eyes are eager to behold him entering the city in his chariot; to this end we made him consul,

A.U.C. 587

ut bellum per quadriennium ingenti etiam pudore
9 nostro[1] tractum perficeret. Cui sortito provinciam, cui proficiscenti praesagientibus animis victoriam triumphumque destinavimus, ei victori triumphum negaturi sumus? et quidem[2] non tantum eum,[3] sed deos etiam
10 suo honore fraudaturi? Dis quoque enim, non solum hominibus, debetur triumphus.[4] Maiores vestri omnium magnarum rerum et principia exorsi
11 a dis sunt[5] et finem statuerunt. Consul proficiscens praetorve paludatis lictoribus in provinciam et ad bellum vota in Capitolio nuncupat; victor perpetrato bello[6] eodem in Capitolium[7] triumphans ad eosdem deos, quibus vota nuncupavit, merita dona portans[8]
12 redit. Pars non minima triumphi est victimae praecedentes, ut appareat dis grates agentem imperatorem ob rem publicam bene gestam redire.
13 Omnis illas victimas, quas traducendas in triumphum dicavit,[9] alias alio abducentes mactate![10] Quid enim?[11] illae epulae senatus, quae nec privato loco nec publico profano, sed in Capitolio eduntur, utrum hominum voluptatis causa an deorum honoris[12] fiunt?

[1] nostro Bas: nostrum V.
[2] sumus? et quidem Madvig: equidem V.
[3] eum add. Weissenborn: om. V.
[4] triumphus J. F. Gronovius: utrũ V.
[5] exorsi a dis sunt Fr: etobsiad discut V.
[6] bello add. Madvig: om. V.
[7] Capitolium Kreyssig: Capitolio V.
[8] dona portans Madvig: bonaque p̄r. trans V: dona bonaque populi Romani portans Rossbach.
[9] traducendas in triumphum dicavit Turnebus: traducendo in triumpho indicavit V.
[10] alio abducentes mactate H. J. Müller: aliosdē temactati V.
[11] enim? illae Weissenborn: emillae V.

that he might bring to an end the war which to B.C. 167 nothing less than our great shame had dragged on through four years. When he was allotted this field of operations, when he left home, we marked him for victory and triumph with minds that read the future; and shall we deny him a triumph when he has won his victory? Nay more—shall we rob not only Paulus, but even the gods, of the honour that belongs to them? For it is to the gods too, not only to men, that we owe a triumph.[1] Your ancestors made the gods their starting-point in every important enterprise, and likewise resorted to them at the conclusion. When consul or praetor, his lictors in their military dress, sets out for his field of action and to war, he proclaims his vows upon the Capitol; when war has ended in victory, he returns in triumph to the same gods on the same Capitol, and brings them the well-earned gifts, as he promised them in his vows. No small part of a triumphal procession is formed by the sacrificial animals going ahead, which make it clear that the general is returning with thanksgiving to the gods for success on behalf of the commonwealth. Away with all those sacrificial victims which he has assigned to be led in the triumphal procession, and offer them up, some here, some there! I ask you! What of the banquet of the senate, which is not held on private property, nor on the unconsecrated land of the state, but on the Capitol—is this ceremony held for the pleasure of men, or in honour of the gods?

[1] Elsewhere (XXVI. xxi. 3; XXXI. xlviii. 12) Livy makes use of the argument that thanksgivings must be followed by a triumph.

[12] honoris Crévier: hominumque V.

A.U.C. 587

14 "Quae omnia[1] auctore Servio Galba turbaturi estis? L. Pauli triumpho portae claudentur? Rex Macedonum Perseus cum liberis et turba alia captivorum, spolia Macedonum, in circo Flaminio[2] relinquentur? L. Paulus privatus tamquam rure
15 rediens a porta domum ibit? Et tu, centurio, miles, quid de imperatore Paulo senatus decrevit potius quam quid Servius Galba fabuletur, audi; et hoc[3]
16 dicere me potius quam illum audi. Ille nihil praeterquam loqui, et id ipsum[4] maledice ac maligne, didicit; ego ter et viciens cum hoste provocato pugnavi;[5] ex omnibus, cum quibus manum conserui, spolia rettuli; insigne corpus honestis cicatricibus, omnibus adverso corpore exceptis, habeo."

17 Nudasse deinde se dicitur et, quo quaeque bello volnera accepta essent, rettulisse. Quae dum ostentat, adapertis forte, quae velanda erant, tumor inguinum proximis risum movit.

18 Tum "hoc quoque, quod ridetis", inquit, "in equo dies noctesque persedendo habeo, nec magis me eius quam cicatricum harum pudet paenitetque, quando numquam mihi impedimento ad rem
19 publicam bene gerendam domi militiaeque fuit. Ego hoc ferro saepe vexatum corpus vetus miles adulescentibus militibus ostendi: Galba nitens et integrum

[1] fiunt? Quae omnia add. Zingerle: om. V: parantur; et vos eas Weissenborn.

[2] in Circo Flaminio Koch: circa fluminio V.

[3] quid de imperatore Paulo senatus decrevit potius quam quid Ser. Galba fabuletur, audi; et hoc Fr: quibus ab imperatore Paulo donatus decrevit potius quam Ser. Galba fabulentur audis et hoc V: et tum, centurio milesque, quibus ab imperatore Paulo donatus es, decreta potius quam quid Ser. Galba fabuletur, audisti et hodie Madvig.

[4] et id ipsum ed. Aldina, J. F. Gronovius: etipsud V.

"Will you play havoc with all these rites at the B.C. 167 instigation of Servius Galba? Will the gates be closed to the triumph of Lucius Paulus? Will King Perseus of Macedonia, together with his sons, the throng of other prisoners, and the spoils of Macedonia, be left behind in the Flaminian Circus? Will Lucius Paulus go home from the gate as a private citizen, as if he were returning from his country house? You, centurion, and you, private, harken to what the senate decrees about General Paulus rather than what Servius Galba babbles, and harken too to my speech rather than his. He has learned nothing except talk, and that of a slanderous and malicious sort; I have on twenty-three occasions challenged and fought an enemy; I brought back the spoils of every man with whom I duelled; I possess a body adorned with honourable scars, every one of them received in front."

He then stripped, it is said, and told in which war he had received each wound. While displaying these, he by chance uncovered what should have remained concealed, and the swelling of his groin raised a laugh among those nearby.

"This too," he then said, "at which you are laughing I got by sitting my horse through whole days and nights; and I feel no more shame or regret for this than for these wounds of mine, since it never hindered me from successfully conducting affairs of state at home or in the field. As a veteran soldier before young soldiers, I have displayed this body of mine which has often been marred by the sword; let Galba uncover his sleek and untouched person.

---

[5] provocato pugnavi Hertz: per provocatio pugnauit V.

A.U.C. 587

20 denudet. Revocate, si videtur, tribuni, ad suffragium tribus; ego ad vos, milites, . . .

XL. Summam[1] omnis captivi auri argentique translati sestertium[2] milliens ducenties fuisse Valerius Antias tradit; qua haud dubie[3] maior aliquanto summa ex numero plaustrorum ponderibusque auri, argenti generatim ab ipso scriptis absumptum
2 efficitur. Alterum tantum aut in bellum proximum aut in fuga, cum Samothracen peteret, dissipatum tradunt: eoque id mirabilius erat, quod tantum pecuniae intra triginta annos post bellum Philippi cum Romanis partim ex fructu metallorum, partim
3 ex vectigalibus aliis coacervatum fuerat. Itaque admodum inops pecuniae Philippus, Perseus contra praedives bellare cum Romanis coepit.
4 Ipse postremo Paulus in curru, magnam cum dignitate alia corporis, tum senecta ipsa maiestatem prae se ferens; post[4] currum inter alios illustres viros filii duo, Q. Maximus[5] et P. Scipio; deinde equites turmatim et cohortes peditum suis quaeque ordinibus.
5 Peditі in singulos dati centeni denarii,[6] duplex centurioni, triplex[7] equiti. Alterum[8] tantum peditі

[1] folium unum amissum; summam Fr: mam V.
[2] sestertium add. Fr: om. V.
[3] qua haud dubie J. F. Gronovius: queautdubie V.
[4] post add. Fr: om. V.
[5] Q. Maximus Sigonius: maximum V.
[6] denarii add. J. F. Gronovius, H. J. Müller: om. V.
[7] centurioni, triplex add. Fr: om. V.
[8] alterum add. Muretus: om. V.

---

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xxxi. 6, supplies the conclusion, the bracketed words being suggested by this: "I shall come down and accompany (you) all and shall discover the base and un-

Tribunes, call back the tribes, if you please, to the voting; I [will join] you, soldiers . . .'' [1] B.C. 167

XL. The total of all the captured gold and silver which was carried in the procession was one hundred and twenty million sesterces, according to the account of Valerius Antias; no doubt a somewhat larger total than this is made up from the number of wagons and the weights of gold and silver in various forms which are mentioned by this same author.[2] As much again was either expended in the late war, or scattered during the flight, when Perseus was making for Samothrace, according to the historians; and this fact is the more marvellous, because this huge sum of money was accumulated within thirty years after Philip's war with the Romans, partly from the output of the mines, and partly from other revenues. Philip therefore began his war against Rome when he was rather ill-supplied with funds, but Perseus, when he was very rich.

Paulus himself came last in his chariot, showing a magnificent presence not only because of the general dignity of his bearing, but because of his advanced age as well. After the chariot came his two sons, Quintus Maximus and Publius Scipio, among other distinguished men; then came the cavalry by troops, and the units of infantry, rank by rank. Each infantryman received one hundred denarii, each centurion, twice the amount, and each cavalryman, grateful who prefer to be led in war by demagogues rather than generals.''

Also missing is the date of the triumph, Nov. 27–29, C.I.L.[2] I. i. p. 48, xxvii, and the description of most of the triumphal procession, cf. Diodorus XXXI. xiii.

[2] Plutarch, Aemilius xxxii, mentions 750 vessels, each containing three talents of coined silver.

A.U.C. 587

daturum fuisse credunt et pro rata aliis, si aut in suffragio honori eius favissent,[1] aut benigne hac ipsa summa pronuntiata[2] acclamassent.[3]

6 Sed non Perseus tantum per illos dies documentum humanorum casuum fuit, in catenis ante currum victoris ducis per urbem hostium ductus, sed etiam victor 7 Paulus, auro purpuraque fulgens. Nam duobus e filiis, quos duobus datis in adoptionem solos nominis, sacrorum familiaeque heredes retinuerat domi, minor, duodecim[4] ferme annos natus, quinque diebus ante triumphum, maior, quattuordecim annorum, 8 triduo post triumphum decessit; quos praetextatos curru vehi cum patre, sibi ipsos similis destinantis[5] 9 triumphos, oportuerat. Paucis post diebus data a M. Antonio tribuno plebis contione, cum de suis rebus gestis more ceterorum imperatorum edissereret, memorabilis[6] eius oratio et digna Romano principe fuit.

XLI. "Quamquam, et qua[7] felicitate rem publicam administraverim, et quae duo[8] fulmina domum meam per hos dies perculerint, non ignorare vos, Quirites, arbitror, cum spectaculo vobis nunc triumphus meus, nunc funera liberorum meorum fuerint, 2 tamen paucis, quaeso, sinatis me cum publica

[1] in suffragio . . . favissent Harant: non suffragi . . . fuissent V.

[2] pronuntiata Muretus: nuntiata V.

[3] acclamassent Fr: classe V.

[4] duodecim add. Fr, Heraeus: om. V.

[5] destinantis Novák: praedestinantis V.

[6] edissereret, memorabilis H. J. Müller: dedissetre morabilis V.

[7] et qua Madvig: ob quã l. paulorationadpr. V.

[8] administraverim, et quae duo J. F. Gronovius: administraverit et duo V.

three times as much. It is thought that double the amount would have been given to the infantry, and proportionately to the rest, if they had supported Paulus' triumph in the voting, or had cheerfully applauded the announcement of the gift as actually given. B.C. 167

But Perseus was not the only testimony at this time to the state of human fortunes, as he was led in chains before the chariot of his conqueror through the city of his enemies; the conqueror Paulus, in the splendour of his gold and purple, was no less a witness. For of the two sons whom he kept at home as the only heirs of his name, his family rites, and his household, after he had given two other sons to be adopted,[1] the younger boy, aged about twelve, died five days before the triumph, and the elder, fourteen years old, died three days after the festivity. These were the minor boys who should have ridden with their father in the chariot, secretly planning like triumphs for themselves. When a few days later an assembly of the commons was called by Marcus Antonius the tribune, and Paulus discoursed, as was customary for commanders, on his exploits, his speech was noteworthy and well-suited to a leading Roman:

XLI. "Although you, my fellow-citizens, are not unaware, I believe, of the good fortune with which I have conducted the affairs of the state, and of the two thunderbolts which have recently struck my house—for you were eyewitnesses first of my triumph, and then of the funerals of my sons—yet I beg you to permit me in a few words to compare, in the proper

[1] See above, XLIV. xxxv. 14 and the note; Plutarch, Aemilius xxxv.

A.U.C. 587

felicitate comparare eo, quo debeo, animo privatam meam fortunam.

3 " Profectus ex Italia classem a Brundisio sole orto solvi; nona diei hora cum omnibus meis navibus Corcyram tenui. Inde quinto die Delphis Apollini pro me exercitibusque et classibus vestris [1] sacrificavi.

4 A Delphis quinto die in castra perveni; ubi exercitu accepto, mutatis quibusdam quae magna impedimenta victoriae erant, progressus, quia inexpugnabilia castra [2] hostium erant neque cogi pugnare poterat rex, inter praesidia eius saltum ad Petram

5 evasi et ad Pydnam regem [3] acie vici; Macedoniam in potestatem populi Romani redegi et, quod bellum per quadriennium tres [4] ante me consules ita gesserunt, ut semper successori traderent gravius, id ego

6 quindecim diebus perfeci. Aliarum deinde secundarum rerum velut proventus secutus; civitates omnes Macedoniae se dediderunt, gaza regia in potestatem venit, rex ipse tradentibus prope ipsis dis in templo Samothracum cum liberis est captus. Mihi quoque ipsi nimia iam fortuna [5] videri eoque

7 suspecta esse. Maris pericula timere coepi in tanta pecunia regia in Italiam traicienda et victore exercitu

8 transportando. Postquam omnia secundo navium cursu in Italiam pervenerunt neque erat quod ultra precarer, illud optavi ut, cum ex summo retro volvi fortuna consuesset, mutationem eius domus mea

[1] vestris Sigonius: lustri V.
[2] castra add. Fr: om. V.
[3] Pydnam regem Madvig: pugnam rege V.
[4] quadriennium tres Leutsch: iiii V.
[5] fortuna Hertz: fortunam V.

spirit, my personal fortune with the good fortune of B.C. 167 the state.

"When I left Italy, I set sail from Brundisium at sunrise; at the ninth hour of the day I reached Corcyra with all my ships. Five days later at Delphi I offered sacrifice to Apollo on my own behalf, and on that of your armies and fleets. From Delphi I arrived five days later in camp. I took command of the army, removed certain great obstacles to victory, and advanced. Because the camp of the enemy was impregnable, and the king could not be compelled to fight, I slipped between his garrisons through the pass at Petra,[1] and at Pydna I conquered the king in battle. I brought Macedonia under the control of the Roman People, and in fifteen days I finished a war which three consuls before me had waged over a period of four years, each in such a way as always to leave a worse situation for his successor. A harvest, as it were, of further successes followed; all the cities of Macedonia surrendered, the royal treasures were secured, the king was taken prisoner along with his children in the temple of Samothrace, almost as if the gods themselves delivered him into our hands. Even to me this good fortune seemed excessive, and therefore I viewed it askance. I began to fear the dangers of the sea during the carrying of the great royal treasure to Italy, and the transfer of the victorious army. After everything had been brought to Italy in a successful voyage, and I had nothing left to pray for, my hope was that, since fortune is wont to plunge downward from its high point, the brunt of this

[1] For this pass, cf. XLIV. xxxii. 9; xxxv, end, and the note. Diodorus XXXI. xviii practically reproduces Livy's sentence above.

A.U.C. 587

9 potius quam res publica sentiret. Itaque defunctam esse fortunam publicam mea tam insigni calamitate spero, quod triumphus meus, velut ad ludibrium casuum humanorum, duobus funeribus liberorum
10 meorum est interpositus. Et cum ego et Perseus nunc nobilia maxime sortis mortalium exempla spectemur, ille, qui ante se captivos captivus[1] ipse
11 duci liberos vidit, incolumes tamen eos habet; ego, qui de illo triumphavi, ab alterius funere filii currum conscendi, rediens alterum[2] ex Capitolio prope iam expirantem inveni;[3] neque ex tanta stirpe liberum
12 superest, qui L. Aemili Pauli nomen ferat. Duos enim tamquam ex magna progenie liberorum in adoptionem datos Cornelia et Fabia gens habent; Paulus in domo praeter senem[4] nemo superest. Sed hanc cladem domus meae vestra felicitas et secunda fortuna publica consolatur."

XLII. Haec tanto dicta animo magis confudere audientium animos quam si miserabiliter orbitatem suam deflendo locutus esset.

2 Cn. Octavius kalendis Decembribus de rege Perseo navalem triumphum egit. Is triumphus sine captivis
3 fuit, sine spoliis. Dedit sociis navalibus in singulos denarios septuagenos quinos, gubernatoribus, qui in navibus fuerant, duplex, magistris navium quadruplex.
4 Senatus deinde habitus est. Patres censuerunt ut Q. Cassius Persea regem cum Alexandro filio Albam in custodiam duceret; comites, pecuniam, argentum,

[1] captivus add. Fr: om. V.
[2] conscendi, rediens alterum add. Vahlen: om. V.
[3] expirantem inveni Vahlen: expirantes veni V.
[4] senem Zingerle: sed V.

[1] Alba Fucens, mentioned as a place of custody in XXX. xvii. 2 and Summary LXI.

change should fall not upon the state, but upon my household. And so I hope that the fortune of Rome has completed its course in so extraordinary a disaster as mine, since my triumph, as if in mockery of human vicissitudes, was interposed between the two funerals of my sons. Both Perseus and I are now on view as especially conspicuous samples of man's lot. Yet he, who as a prisoner saw his children led as prisoners before him, yet has those children unharmed; whereas I who celebrated the triumph over him mounted my chariot after the funeral of one son, and when I returned from the Capitol found the other almost on the point of death, nor is there one left of so splendid a generation of sons to carry on the name of Lucius Aemilius Paulus. For two sons were given in adoption, as if from a great stock of children, and they belong to the Cornelian and Fabian clans. Not a Paulus is left in my house, save one old man. But I am consoled in this disaster to my house by your happiness and the good fortune of the state." B.C. 167

XLII. These words, spoken with such magnificent spirit, caused more turmoil of soul to the hearers than if his speech had been a pitiable lamentation for his bereavement.

On the first of December, Gnaeus Octavius held a naval triumph over King Perseus. This triumph was unadorned with prisoners or spoils. Octavius presented to each of the sailors seventy-five denarii, to the pilots of the ships twice as much, and to the captains, four times the amount.

The senate then met. The Fathers voted that Quintus Cassius should conduct King Perseus with his son Alexander to Alba[1] for safe-keeping; he was to permit the king to keep intact the staff, money, silver, u.c. 587 instrumentum, quod haberet, nihil detrahens habere sineret; Bithys, filius Cotyis,[1] regis Thracum, cum[2] obsidibus in custodiam Carseolos est missus. Ceteros captivos, qui in triumpho ducti erant, in carcerem condi placuit.

6 Paucos post dies, quam haec acta erant,[3] legati ab Cotye, rege Thracum, venerunt pecuniam ad redi-
7 mendum filium aliosque obsides adportantes. Eis in senatum introductis et id ipsum argumenti praetendentibus orationi,[4] non sua voluntate Cotyn bello iuvisse Persea, quod obsides dare coactus esset, orantibusque ut eos pretio, quantum ipsi statuissent
8 patres, redimi paterentur, responsum ex auctoritate senatus est, populum Romanum meminisse amicitiae, quae cum Cotye maioribusque eius et gente Thracum
9 fuisset. Obsides datos crimen, non criminis defensionem esse, cum Thracum genti ne quietus quidem Perseus, nedum bello Romano occupatus timendus
10 fuerit. Ceterum, etsi Cotys Persei gratiam praetulisset amicitiae populi Romani, magis quid se dignum esset, quam quid merito eius fieri posset, aestima-
11 turum, filium atque obsides ei remissurum. Beneficia gratuita esse populi Romani; pretium eorum malle relinquere in accipientium animis quam praesens exigere.

[1] detrahens habere sineret; Bithys, filius Cotyis add. Madvig: om. V.
[2] Thracum, cum Madvig: tracũ V.
[3] quam haec acta erant Madvig: qua haec tanta V.
[4] orationi J. F. Gronovius: orationis V.

---

[1] Plutarch, Aemilius xxxvii relates that Perseus died no long while after by self-starvation; though a story was told that his guards caused his death from sleeplessness by over-and furnishings which he had. Bithys, the son of B.C. 167

Cotys, King of Thrace, was sent with the hostages to Carseoli for safe-keeping. It was voted to place in the prison the other prisoners who were led in the triumph.[1]

A few days after these transactions, envoys came from Cotys, King of Thrace, bringing money to ransom his son and the other hostages. When these envoys were brought before the senate, they used the fact itself as the theme of their apology, saying that Cotys had not voluntarily aided Perseus in the war, because he had been compelled to give hostages; the envoys pleaded that they should be permitted to ransom them for whatever amount the Fathers themselves might determine. The answer authorized by the senate was that the Roman People were mindful of the friendship which had existed between them and Cotys, his ancestors, and the people of Thrace; but the giving of hostages constituted an accusation, not a defence against accusation, since the Thracian people had no reason to fear Perseus even when he was at peace, to say nothing of his being involved in a war against Rome. However, although Cotys had preferred the favour of Perseus to the friendship of the Roman People, the latter would reckon rather what was worthy of themselves than what action would answer to his deserts, and would send him back his son and his hostages. Benefits conferred by the Roman People, said the senate, are without charge; the Romans prefer to leave the price on deposit in the hearts of the recipients rather than to demand cash down.

officious attentions. His son Alexander learned a trade, and presumably lived out a normal life.

U.C. 587 Legati tres nominati, T. Quinctius Flamininus,[1] C. Licinius Nerva, M. Caninius Rebilus, qui obsides in Thraciam reducerent; et Thracibus munera data 12 in singulos binum milium aeris. Bithys cum ceteris obsidibus a Carseolis accersitus ad patrem cum legatis missus.

Naves regiae captae de Macedonibus invisitatae ante magnitudinis in campo Martio subductae sunt.

XLIII. Haerente adhuc non in animis modo, sed paene in oculis memoria Macedonici triumphi L. Anicius Quirinalibus triumphavit de rege Gentio
2 Illyriisque. Similia omnia magis visa hominibus quam paria; minor ipse imperator, et nobilitate Anicius cum Aemilio et iure imperii praetor cum consule conlatus; non Gentius Perseo, non Illyrii Macedonibus, non spolia spoliis, non pecunia pecuniae,[2] non dona donis comparari poterant.
3 Itaque sicut praefulgebat huic triumphus recens, ita apparebat ipsum per se intuentibus nequaquam esse
4 contemnendum. Perdomuerat intra paucos dies terra marique ferocem, locis munimentisque [3] fretam gentem Illyriorum; regem regiaeque omnes stirpis ceperat.

Transtulit in triumpho multa militaria signa
5 spoliaque alia et supellectilem regiam, auri pondo viginti et septem, argenti decem et novem pondo,

[1] tres nominati, T. Quinctius Flamininus Madvig: trans nominatius quintius idaminimus V.

[2] spoliis, non pecunia pecuniae Sigonius: sponsiliis non pecuniae V.

[3] munimentisque Kreyssig: monumentisque V.

[1] February 17.

Three envoys, Titus Quinctius Flamininus, Gaius Licinius Nerva, and Marcus Caninius Rebilus, were appointed to escort the hostages back to Thrace. Gifts of two thousand asses apiece were given to the Thracians. Bithys was summoned, along with the other hostages, from Carseoli, and was sent off to his father with the envoys. B.C. 167

The king's ships captured from the Macedonians, of a size never previously seen, were beached by the Campus Martius.

XLIII. While recollections of the Macedonian triumph remained not only in people's minds, but almost before their eyes, Lucius Anicius celebrated his triumph over King Gentius and the Illyrians on the festival of Quirinus.[1] Men saw in each detail a resemblance, but no equality. The commander himself was the lesser, both in public esteem, as an Anicius compared with an Aemilius, and in rank of office, a praetor rather than a consul. Gentius could not be compared to Perseus, the Illyrians to the Macedonians, nor the spoils of the one to those of the other, nor the moneys, nor the gifts to the soldiers. But though accordingly the previous triumph outshone this one, yet it was also clear to those who contemplated this one on its merits that it was by no means to be scorned. Within a few days Anicius had overcome the Illyrian people, bold on both land and sea, and confident in their terrain and their fortifications; he had captured the king and all the royal family.

In his triumph he bore through the city many military standards and other booty, as well as the royal furniture, twenty-seven pounds of gold, nineteen pounds of silver, thirteen thousand denarii, and

A.U.C. 587

denarium decem tria milia et centum viginti milia 6 Illyrici argenti. Ante currum ducti Gentius rex cum coniuge et liberis et Caravantius, frater regis, et 7 aliquot nobiles Illyrii. De praeda militibus in singulos quadragenos quinos denarios, duplex cen-turioni, triplex equiti, sociis nominis Latini quantum civibus, et sociis navalibus dedit quantum militibus.
8 Laetior hunc triumphum est secutus miles, multisque dux ipse carminibus celebratus. Sestertium ducentiens ex ea praeda redactum esse auctor est Antias, praeter aurum argentumque, quod in aerarium sit latum; quod quia unde redigi potuerit non apparebat, auctorem pro re posui.
9 Rex Gentius cum liberis et coniuge et fratre Spoletium in custodiam ex senatus consulto ductus, ceteri captivi Romae in carcerem coniecti; recusanti-busque custodiam Spoletinis Iguvium[1] reges tra-10 ducti. Reliquum ex Illyrico praedae ducenti viginti lembi erant; de Gentio rege captos eos Corcyraeis et Apolloniatibus et Dyrrhachinis Q. Cassius ex senatus consulto tribuit.

XLIV. Consules eo anno agro tantum Ligurum populato, cum hostes exercitus numquam eduxissent, nulla re memorabili gesta Romam ad magistratus subrogandos redierunt et primo comitiali die consules
2 crearunt M. Claudium Marcellum, C. Sulpicium
Gallum, deinde praetores postero die L. Iulium, L.

[1] Iguvium Turnebus: igituruium V.

[1] Probably the victoriati, of 53 grains, which the Romans later imitated for use about the Adriatic, cf. XLI. xiii. 7.

one hundred and twenty thousand Illyrian silver- B.C. 167 pieces.[1] Before the chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children, Caravantius the king's brother, and several prominent Illyrians. Anicius gave from the booty to each soldier forty-five denarii, double the amount to each centurion, and three times as much to the cavalry; the allies of the Latin Name received as much as the Romans, and the sailors as much as the soldiers. The soldiery followed this triumph in better spirits, and the leader was the subject of many songs. Twenty million sesterces was realized from this booty, according to Antias, besides the gold and silver delivered to the treasury; since it was not clear to me from what source this amount could be derived, I have quoted an historian instead of stating a fact.

King Gentius with his wife, his children, and his brother, was taken to Spoletium for safe-keeping, in accordance with a decree of the senate. The other prisoners were thrown into the prison at Rome. When the people of Spoletium refused to take custody, the royal family was transferred to Iguvium. There remained from the Illyrian booty two hundred and twenty scout-ships; as prizes taken from King Gentius they were presented to the people of Corcyra, Apollonia, and Dyrrhachium by Quintus Cassius, in accordance with a decree of the senate.

XLIV. In that year the consuls merely ravaged the fields of the Ligurians, since the enemy never led out their forces. Without accomplishing anything worthy of note, the consuls returned to Rome to attend to the election of their successors, and on the first day of the elections, declared Marcus Claudius Marcellus and Gaius Sulpicius Gallus elected as consuls. On the next day there were elected as

A.U.C. 587

Apuleium Saturninum, A. Licinium Nervam, P. Rutilium Calvum, P. Quinctilium Varum, M. Fonteium. His praetoribus duae urbanae provinciae sunt decretae, duae Hispaniae, Sicilia ac Sardinia.

3 Intercalatum eo anno; postridie Terminalia kal.[1] intercalariae fuerunt. Augur eo anno mortuus est C. Claudius: in eius locum augures legerunt T. Quinctium Flamininum. Et flamen Quirinalis mortuus Q.[2] Fabius Pictor.

4 Eo anno rex Prusia venit Romam cum filio Nicomede. Is magno comitatu urbem ingressus ad forum
5 a porta tribunalque Q.[3] Cassi praetoris perrexit concursuque undique facto deos, qui urbem Romam incolerent, senatumque et populum Romanum salutatum se dixit venisse et gratulatum, quod Persea Gentiumque reges vicissent, Macedonibusque et Illyriis in dicionem redactis auxissent imperium.
6 Cum praetor senatum ei, si vellet,[4] eo die daturum dixisset, biduum petit, quo templa deum urbemque
7 et hospites amicosque viseret. Datus qui circumduceret eum, L.[5] Cornelius Scipio quaestor, qui et

[1] kal. add. Crévier, Weissenborn : om. V.
[2] Q. Sigonius : M. V.
[3] Q. add. Fr : om. V.
[4] vellet Wesenberg : velit V.
[5] L. add. Fr : om. V.

---

[1] A return to peace-time practice: the Spains were combined during the war, so that a praetor could be assigned as naval commander, or for other special purposes.

[2] See XLIII. xi. 13 and the note on the need at this time for frequent intercalation. This intercalary month began on what would ordinarily have been the twenty-fourth of February.

[3] A clash between his priesthood and his desire for a public career is related in XXXVII. li. 1–6; his grandson or great-

praetors Lucius Julius, Lucius Apuleius Saturninus, B.C. 167
Aulus Licinius Nerva, Publius Rutilius Calvus, Publius Quinctilius Varus, and Marcus Fonteius. The provinces appointed for these praetors were the two city magistracies, the two Spains,[1] Sicily, and Sardinia.

There was an intercalation in this year; the day after the Terminalia was the first day of the intercalary month.[2] An augur died this year, Gaius Claudius; in his place, the augurs chose Titus Quinctius Flamininus. The flamen of Quirinus, Quintus Fabius Pictor,[3] also died.

In this year King Prusias came to Rome with his son Nicomedes. Entering the city with a large train, he proceeded from the gate to the Forum and the judgment-seat of Quintus Cassius the praetor. A crowd gathered from all sides; Prusias announced that he had come to bring greetings to the gods who inhabited the city of Rome, and to the senate and the Roman People, and to congratulate them on their victory over King Perseus and King Gentius, and on the extension of their empire by placing the Macedonians and Illyrians under their sway. When the praetor offered to call a session of the senate for him on that very day, if he pleased, Prusias asked for a two-day interval, during which he might visit the temples of the gods, the city, and his friends and guest-friends. There was assigned to him as escort Lucius Cornelius Scipio the quaestor, who had also grandson, Numerius Fabius Pictor, issued coins in honour of his ancestor, showing an armed figure with the priest's headdress in his hand, perhaps to indicate that Quintus was both soldier and priest—unless the figure represents Quirinus, who had military functions even before his identification with the deified Romulus during the late Republic.

A.U.C. 587 Capuam ei obviam missus fuerat; et aedes, quae ipsum comitesque eius benigne reciperent, conductae.
8 Tertio post die senatum adiit:[1] gratulatus victoriam est: merita sua in eo bello commemoravit; petiit, ut votum sibi solvere, Romae in Capitolio decem maiores hostias et Praeneste unam Fortunae, liceret—ea vota pro victoria populi Romani esse—, 9 et ut societas secum renovaretur agerque sibi de rege Antiocho captus, quem nulli datum a[2] populo Romano Galli possiderent, daretur. Filium postremo Nicomedem senatui commendavit.

Omnium, qui in Macedonia imperatores fuerant,
10 favore est adiutus. Itaque cetera, quae petebat, concessa; de agro responsum est legatos ad rem inspiciendam missuros; si[3] is ager populi Romani fuisset nec cuiquam datus esset, dignissimum eo
11 dono Prusiam habituros esse; si autem Antiochi non fuisse et[4] eo ne populi quidem Romani factum appareret[4] aut datum Gallis esse, ignoscere Prusiam debere,[4] si ex nullius iniuria quidquam ei datum vellet
12 populus Romanus. Ne cui detur[5] quidem, gratum esse donum posse, quod eum qui det, ubi velit,[6]
13 ablaturum esse sciat. Filii[7] Nicomedis commendationem accipere. Quanta cura regum amicorum

[1] senatum adiit Fr, Drakenborch: senatuagit V.
[2] a add. Fr: om. V.
[3] si add. Kreyssig: om. V.
[4] fuisse et . . . appareret . . . esse, ignoscere Prusiam debere Hertz: peruissent . . . apparat . . . essetignosceret Prusiam deberet V.
[5] cui detur Crévier: quo detur qui detur V.
[6] velit Madvig: vellet V.
[7] filii Madvig: felici V.

been sent to Capua to meet him; and a house was B.C. 167 rented for him, where he and his suite might be well entertained.

On the third day following, he approached the senate; he offered congratulations on the victory; he recited his services in the war; and he requested permission to fulfill a vow of ten full-grown victims at Rome in the Capitol and one at Praeneste to Fortune. This vow, he said, was for the victory of Rome; and he asked that the alliance with him should be renewed, and that the land taken from King Antiochus, which had been assigned to no one by the Roman People and was being held by Galatians, should be given to him. Last of all, he placed his son Nicomedes under the protection of the senate.

He was aided by the good-will of all those who had been commanders in Macedonia. Consequently all but one of his requests were granted; as to the land, the answer was that envoys would be sent to look the matter over; if this land belonged to the Roman People and had been assigned to no one, they would consider Prusias most worthy of receiving it as a gift; if, on the other hand, it was shown not to have belonged to Antiochus, and therefore not to have come into the possession of the Roman People, or that it had been presented to the Galatians, then Prusias must pardon the Roman People, if they were unwilling to wrong anyone in the process of making him a present. A gift, said the senate, could not be pleasing even to the recipient, if he knew that the giver would take it away again whenever he pleased. The senate accepted the commission to protect his son Nicomedes. How great was the care with which liberos tueatur populus Romanus, documento Ptolemaeum, Aegypti regem, esse.

A.U.C. 587

14 Cum hoc responso Prusias est dimissus. Munera ei ex . . .[1] sestertiis iussa dari et vasorum argente-
15 orum pondo quinquaginta. Et filio regis Nicomedi ex ea summa munera dari censuerunt, ex qua Masgabae, filio regis Masinissae, data essent; et ut victimae aliaque, quae ad sacrificium pertinerent, seu Romae seu Praeneste immolare vellet, regi ex publico
16 sicut magistratibus Romanis praeberentur; et ut ex classe, quae Brundisi esset, naves longae viginti
17 adsignarentur, quibus uteretur; donec ad classem dono datam ei rex pervenisset, L. Cornelius Scipio ne ab eo abscederet sumptumque ipsi et comitibus praeberet, donec navem conscendisset.

18 Mire laetum ea benignitate[2] in se populi Romani regem fuisse ferunt; munera sibi ipsi emi non sisse,[3]
19 filium iussisse donum populi Romani accipere. Haec de Prusia nostri scriptores. Polybius eum regem indignum maiestate nominis tanti tradit; pilleatum, capite raso, obviam ire[4] legatis solitum libertumque se populi Romani ferre;[5] ideo insignia ordinis eius
20 gerere; Romae quoque, cum veniret in curiam, summisisse se et osculo limen curiae contigisse et deos servatores suos senatum appellasse aliamque

[1] lacunam indicat Fr.

[2] mire laetum ea benignitate Crévier: amireletumeteabenignitatem V.

[3] sisse Kreyssig: siesse V.

[4] ire add. Fr: om. V.

[5] se populi Romani ferre Madvig: si p̄r. ferret V.

the Roman People guarded the sons of kings was B.C. 167 shown, said the senate, by the case of Ptolemy, King of Egypt.

With this answer, Prusias was dismissed. Gifts were ordered given him of a value of . . .[1] sesterces, and silver vessels of fifty pounds' weight. It was also voted to give to Prince Nicomedes gifts to the same amount as had been given to Masgaba, the son of King Masinissa. It was further voted that the victims and other requisites for sacrifice should be furnished at public expense to the king, just as to Roman magistrates, whether he wished to sacrifice at Rome or Praeneste. Also twenty war-vessels from the fleet at Brundisium were to be assigned to his use; until the king should reach the fleet presented to him, Lucius Cornelius Scipio was to escort him uninterruptedly, and to provide for the expenses of the king and his suite, until he boarded ship.

They say that the king was wonderfully pleased with this expression of good-will toward himself on the part of the Roman People. He refused to have gifts bought for himself, but instructed his son to accept the gift of the Roman People. Such is the account of Prusias given by Roman writers. Polybius reports[2] that this king was unworthy of the dignity of so high a title; that he was accustomed to meet envoys with his head shaved, while he wore a freedman's cap and called himself the freedman of the Roman People, giving this as his reason for wearing the emblem of this class. Polybius further says that when Prusias entered the senate-house at Rome, he fell down and kissed the threshold of the senate-

[1] The amount has been lost from the MS.
[2] XXX. 18 (19. 16).

A.U.C. 587 orationem non tam honorificam audientibus quam sibi deformem habuisse.

21 Moratus circa urbem triginta haud amplius dies in regnum est profectus, actumque in Asia bellum inter Eumenen et Gallos in . . . it.[1]

[1] inde coepit Mommsen: increvit Gitlbauer: innotuit Wesely. Verba ultima in lineis duabus obscurissimis; inde lineae sex ad colophona.

house, hailed the senate as his saviour-gods,[1] and indulged in further speech which conveyed more disgrace to himself than honour to his hearers. B.C. 167

After remaining in the vicinity of Rome no more than thirty days, he set out for his kingdom, and . . .[2] the war under way between Eumenes and the Galatians.

[1] This title (Soter) was adopted by several Hellenistic rulers, notably Ptolemy the First.

[2] A few lines are missing in the MS. at the end of this book. The lost verb of this sentence is presumably "egged on," or the like.

LIBER XLV PERIOCHA

PERSEUS ab Aemilio Paulo in Samothrace captus est. Cum Antiochus, Syriae rex, Ptolemaeum et Cleopatram, Aegypti reges, obsideret et missis ad eum a senatu legatis qui iuberent ab solo [1] regis absisteret, editisque mandatis consideraturum se quid faciendum esset respondisset, unus ex legatis Popilius virga regem circumscripsit iussitque, ante quam circulo excederet, responsum daret. Qua asperitate effecit ut Antiochus bellum omitteret. Legationes gratulantium populorum atque regum in senatu admissae, Rhodiorum, qui eo bello contra populum R. faverant, exclusa. Postera die cum de eo quaereretur, ut his bellum indiceretur, causam in senatu patriae suae legati egerunt; nec tamquam socii nec tamquam hostes dimissi. Macedonia in provinciae formam redacta Aemilius Paulus repugnantibus militibus ipsius propter minorem praedam et contradicente Ser. Sulpicio Galba triumphavit et Persen cum tribus filiis duxit ante currum. Cuius triumphi laetitia ne solida ei contigeret, duorum filiorum funeribus insignita est; quorum alterius mors triumphum patris praecessit, alterius secuta est.

Lustrum a censoribus conditum est: censa sunt civium capita $\overline{\text{CCCXII}}$ DCCCV. Prusias Bithyniae rex Romam, ut senatui gratias ageret ob victoriam ex Macedonia partam, venit et Nicomeden filium senatui commendavit. Rex plenus adulationis libertum se populi Romani dicebat.

[1] ab solo Rossbach, de ab dubitans: ab obsidione solo mss., ab obsidione socii Leidensis, ed. pr.

SUMMARY OF BOOK XLV

PERSEUS was captured by Aemilius Paulus in Samothrace. When Antiochus, king of Syria, was besieging Ptolemy and Cleopatra, the rulers of Egypt, envoys were sent to him by the senate to bid him withdraw from the king's land. When the message was delivered, he answered that he would consider what he would do, whereupon Popilius, one of the envoys, drew a circle around the king with his rod, and ordered him to give an answer before he left the circle. By this harshness, Popilius induced Antiochus to give up the war. Embassies of peoples and kings offering congratulations were received by the senate; that of the Rhodians, whose sympathies had been against the Roman People in that war, was shut out. On the following day, when the question of declaring war against them was under discussion, the envoys pleaded the cause of their country in the senate. They were sent away neither as allies nor as enemies. After Macedonia had been organized as a province, Aemilius Paulus celebrated his triumph, although his own soldiers strove against it because of too little booty, and Servius Sulpicius Galba spoke against it. Perseus and his three children were led before the chariot. Paulus' enjoyment of this triumph was not unalloyed, but was marked by the funerals of his two sons. The death of the first preceded his father's triumph, that of the other followed it.

The end of the lustrum was marked by the censors; 312,805 citizens were counted.[1] King Prusias of Bithynia came to Rome to offer his thanks to the senate for the victory secured over the Macedonians, and entrusted his son Nicomedes to the care of the senate. The king, full of flattery, used to call himself the freedman of the Roman People.

[1] The account of this is lost between chs. xiv. and xv.